

LIVES OF THE BRITISH SAINTS

83 Guedesholen 149? Colthe Bullen, Baden
→ 149 St. Gertrude in Wald

Anna 201 149-150 p 51-55

223 sanctuar

225 Pungysant

→ 256 Ketteler "Koch-jarl Kær Løve" (Glemten)
Morten Wledig - Emperor Clemens Maximilian

→ 258 Sam Eilen - Wisting H.C.

→ 258 Helenele Royal Maaler

448 St. Mandeg (Mauve) dolmen se

445 2 maas þy þan cell at death of St. Maryma

→ 281 Sing a song of me O. Vesper of the Fung

50 St Aldate
48 Langford

170 St. White

→ [280] Review of Osiris in which (Budge Frontispiece to God in Sun) + numbers

418 marmoset Hybrid w head without

979 wye
295 h with inscribed names 276 Stun 276 TAILS

⇒ 298 scenes (scenes?)
281 jumps Sing a song to me 0

47 struck off head of ...
395 now before head of ... - (see p 100)

281 Dm's

81 ST GIL D&S

341 Chapels on Ramsey Island

274 Villenarqué

28

300 St Ild "am ... Israel = St Joseph of Annunatio

> 201 St James a Gwethmwr 332 St James (Bioscan)

305 St. Illud saved under Arthur 314

24-30 St Finian

315 St. A. Induct. Glotindry & Slapinida

203 St. Ild

300-301 St Ild with Holy Grail
St Ild = St Joseph of Annunatio Plidius

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

THE LIVES OF
THE BRITISH SAINTS

THE SAINTS OF WALES AND CORNWALL AND SUCH IRISH SAINTS AS HAVE DEDICATIONS IN BRITAIN

By
S. BARING-GOULD, M.A.,
AND JOHN FISHER, B.D.

IN FOUR VOLUMES.

VOL. III.

LONDON :
The Honourable Society of Cymmrodorion
NEW STONE BUILDINGS, 64, CHANCERY LANE

1911

Contents of Volume III

PAGE

THE LIVES—

S. Faustus—S. Mynno	I
-------------------------------	---

List of Illustrations

Fracan, Gwen Teirbron and Winwaloe before S. Corentine. From a Painting at Lesguen, Plouvién, Finistère	-facing page 42
S. Germanus. From Stained Glass, S. Neot	,, ,, 72
Germanus Foundations	,, ,, 76
Statue of S. Germanus at Pleyben	,, ,, 78
S. Germoe. From fresco in S. Breage (restored)	,, ,, 80
Map of Bokerly and Grim's Dykes	,, ,, 86
Roman Roads from Old Sarum and Badbury to Bath.	,, ,, 94
Foundations of Gildas and his Sons and Grandsons in Armorica	,, ,, 114
S. Gildas. From 15th Century Statue at Locminé	,, ,, 128
Statue of Gwen Teirbron and her Sons, Winwaloe, Gwethenoc and James. In the Chapel of S. Venec	,, ,, 168
S. Gwenfrewi. From 15th Century Glass at Llandyrnog	,, ,, 194
S. Gwynllyw. From Statue at S. Woolo's	,, ,, 240
S. Gwynog. From Stained Glass at Llanwnog	,, ,, 246
S. Huervé, with his Wolf and Guiharan. From a Statue formerly in the Church of Kerlaz, near Douarnenez.	,, ,, 280
S. Illtyd. From a Statue at Locildut, Sizun	,, ,, 316
S. Mabenna. From Stained Glass, S. Neot	,, ,, 390
S. Madrun. Formerly at Madryn, Pwllheli	,, ,, 398
S. Mancus. From Stained Glass, S. Neot	,, ,, 434
S. Marchell. From 15th Century Glass at Llandyrnog	,, ,, 438
S. Mawes. From a Statue at Ergué-Gaberic	,, ,, 446
S. Mawgan. From Stained Glass at La Meaugon	,, ,, 452
S. Mybard. From Stained Glass, S. Neot	,, ,, 478

LIVES OF THE BRITISH SAINTS

Vol. iii.

S. FAUSTUS, Bishop, Confessor

As has been already stated, under the head of EDEYRN, it is not possible to identify Faustus of Riez with the Faustus or Edeyrn, born of incest, son of Gwrtheyrn or Vortigern, as is apparently done by Nennius.

Sidonius Apollinaris says that Faustus was the son of a noble and saintly British mother. He might possibly have so described the daughter of Vortigern, if her after life was spent in penance and devotion; but the chronology of Faustus cannot be made to fit in with that of a son of the British prince.

Sidonius says nothing as to who was the father of Faustus, but that may be explained by supposing that the father was dead when he came to make the acquaintance of the son.¹

Faustus can hardly have been born earlier than 400. Whilst young he went to Lerins, and it was probably whilst there that he became intimate with a fellow-countryman, a Bishop Rioc, or Riocatus, as Sidonius calls him, who paid two visits to Southern Gaul and the Province.²

In 434 Maximus, Abbot of Lerins, ascended the episcopal throne of Riez, and Faustus was elected in his room to preside over the monastic community. He must have been full young for so important a position; but as he lived till after 484, it is not possible to set back his birth much earlier than 400.

His mother, at an advanced age, lived near him at Lerins. He had a brother, a priest, Memorius, under him; and in the society was likewise a brother of his correspondent Sidonius Apollinaris.

At Lerins Faustus led a very strict life, was devoted to study, and strove to imitate the lives of the fathers of the Egyptian deserts. He wrote a letter to a deacon, named Gratus, who was infected with Nestorian errors. Augustine informs us that he gave harbour in his isle to Julian of Eclana, and to Pelagius, when expelled from Italy for their heresy.

¹ S. Avitus of Vienne says that Faustus was born in Britain.

² Apoll. Sidon, Mon. Germ. Hist., viii. Krusch in Proem., liv-lxxv; and pp. 157, 255, et seq.

He opposed Arianism with great ardour. He sent two of his treatises by Rioc to Britain in or about 450.

On account of the death of Maximus in 462 there ensued a fresh election at Riez, and Faustus was chosen to succeed him. The vigorous opposition to Arianism offered by Faustus brought upon him the resentment of Euric, the Visigoth King, who sent him into exile in 481; and he did not return to his flock till 484, on the death of the king.

At the close of the century, when Gennadius wrote his work on Illustrious Men, Faustus was still living.¹

In the list of his works, given by Gennadius, the series opens with a book De Spiritu Sancto. This treatise is still extant, and has been repeatedly but incorrectly attributed to the Roman deacon Pascasius.² Evidence to show that Faustus was the real author has been produced by C. P. Caspari.³

Another work, according to Gennadius, was an Opus egregium de Gratia Dei, which was directed against the teaching of a Gallic priest, Lucidus, relative to Predestination. Lucidus held that with the Fall man had lost the power of free will, and all impulse towards God, and that God predestined men to life or to damnation as He pleased. This doctrine was condemned by the Synod of Arles in 475; and in that of Lyons in 476; and the bishops present expressed a desire for a complete exposition of the Catholic dogma of grace, and this it was which led to the composition of the work mentioned, by Faustus.

There can be no doubt but that Faustus, in common with S. Hilary of Arles and other Gallic saints, viewed with alarm the iron dogma of predestination to which Augustine was endeavouring to commit the Church; and which finally broke forth in all its offensiveness in the heresy of Calvin. Faustus saw that the doctrine, logically carried out and acted upon, cut at the roots of Christian morality, and fatally affected the fulness of the redemptive work of Christ. Benedictus Paulinus consulted Faustus on questions concerning repentance. The answer of the Bishop of Riez was: "I am asked whether the knowledge of the Trinity in Unity suffices to salvation in things divine; I answer, a rational grasp of the faith is not all that is required of us, there must also be the reason for pleasing God. Naked truth without merits is empty and vain."

¹ De viris illust., c. 85.

² Under the head of Pascasius in Migne, Patr. Lat., lviii, pp. 783-836.

³ Unbedrückte . . . Quellen zur Geschichte des Taufsymbols. Christiania, 1869, pp. 214-24.

The predestinarianism of Augustine was the rust of his old Manichaeism working its way out of his soul in dogma; the Pelagians and semi-Pelagians went too far in the assertion of the force of the human will to resist evil, unassisted by grace.

Faustus called down on his head the wrath of the thorough-paced Augustinians, and S. Fulgentius of Ruspe took up his pen against him, and the teaching of Fulgentius was rejected by Popes Gelasius and Hormisdas, and by the Council of Orange in 529.

Two little works mentioned by Gennadius, Adversus Arianos et Macedonianos, and Adversus eos qui dicunt esse in creaturis aliquiū incorporeum, are remarkable. In the latter he attributes to the soul a sort of corporeal though spiritual envelope.

In or about 470 Claudianus Mamertus attacked his thesis in three books, De Statu Animæ.

Faustus was regarded as one of the most eloquent preachers of his day, and some of his sermons are extant, as are also some of his letters. A collection of fifty-six homilies was made, apparently by Eusebius of Angers, in the eleventh century, which has been erroneously attributed to Eusebius of Emesa. They are sermons by ancient Gallic bishops, and among these are almost certainly some by Faustus of Riez.

Faustus is thought to have died about 490. He is venerated at Riez on September 28.

In some martyrologies he is given on January 16, as Maurolycus, Ferrarius, and Greven, and Saussaye.

A parish near Pau in the Basses-Pyrénées is called after this saint. Its church was wrecked in the disastrous days of Jeanne d'Albret. When restored, it was given a new patron, S. John the Baptist. S. Faustus has neither a statue nor a commemoration in the church that bears his name.

The works of Faustus are in Migne's Patr. Lat., lviii, pp. 775-89, and Engelbrecht, Fausti Regiensis Opera, Wien, 1891.

S. FEBRIC, Confessor

IN the circumstances relating to the grant, in 955, of Lann Bedeui, identified with Penterry, in Monmouthshire, to the Church of Llandaff, is mentioned "Ecclesia Sanctorum Iarmen et Febric."¹ The church is supposed to be S. Arvan's, in the same county, but of the two saints nothing is known.¹

¹ Book of Llan Dâu, p. 219; see also 1, p. 174.

S. FEDDWID, see S. MEDDWID

S. FEOCK, Bishop, Confessor

THE Cornish Feock is Fiacc, Bishop of Sletty, disciple of S. Patrick. His veneration extends to Brittany. It is certainly a remarkable instance of the intercommunication that existed between Ireland, Britain, and Armorica, that we find the same saint at home in all three.

The authorities for the Life of Fiacc are, in the first place, the various Lives of S. Patrick, as given by Colgan, in his Trias Thaumaturga. There is no independent Life of the saint; but there is one in Albert le Grand, from the Legendarium of S. Matthew in Léon, and from a MS. history of Brittany.

The notices that we have concerning the saint in the Irish records relate only to his acts in Ireland, because nothing was known of his life out of his native isle; and the Breton life we have deals with his acts in Armorica, and passes over his acts in Ireland, or treats them in the vaguest manner, making, however, a gross blunder that shall be noticed in the sequel.

Fiacc is introduced to our notice for the first time when S. Patrick, accompanied by pious clerics, appeared at the convention of Tara, in 455. Precisely the same story is told of him then, as of Erc. Erc had stood up on the previous day, when Patrick had been summoned before Laoghaire at Slane. So, on this occasion, when Patrick appeared before the king and the great assembly at Tara, he was received by all seated, with the exception of Dubhtach, the king's chief poet, and Fiacc, his nephew, then a lad of eighteen.²

Fiacc was the son of Dubhtach's sister. His father MacDaire had been expelled from his patrimony in what is now Queen's County by Crimthan king of the Hy Cinnselach. In exile he had become a widower, and had married a sister of Dubhtach the poet.

¹ Sir J. Rhys (Arch. Camb., 1895, p. 38, in an article on "The Goidels in Wales") is disposed to regard Febric as the Goidelic form of a name which occurs in the Book of S. Chad as Guhebric, and in the Book of Llan Dâv (pp. 257-8) as Guebric and Huefric. With the equation compare the Welsh river name Fferws=Goidelic Fergus, the Welsh Gwrwst or Grwst.

² Tripertite Life, pp. 45, 53. Notes by Muirchu Maccu-Machtheni, p. 283.

All the Hy Bairrche, the family to which Fiacc belonged, were now living dispersed, nursing their resentment and looking for a chance of revenge and of recovery of their land between the Nore and the Barrow.

A few years after the incident at Tara, Fiacc was baptised by S. Patrick himself, during his missionary visitation of Leinster.¹

Crimthan, the king of the Hy Cinnselach, who occupied Wexford, and had annexed the Hy Biarrche territory, had opposed the progress of the gospel, and had expelled from his territories such as professed Christianity. Patrick succeeded in softening the old man and inducing him to be baptised. This accelerated the conversion of his tribesmen, and necessitated the establishment among them of a native priesthood.

With this view the apostle consulted Dubhtach, with whom he was on the most friendly terms, as to what was to be done, and whom he was to send to organize the Church among the Hy Cinnselach and in the old Hy Bairrche territory. "The man I require as bishop," said Patrick, "must be a free man, of good family, without blemish, not given to fawning, learned, hospitable, the husband of one wife, and the father of a single child." The object of the last consideration was that the new bishop should not be cumbered with family cares.

Dubhtach recommended his nephew, Fiacc the Fair. "But how persuade him to take on him the burden of the office?" asked Patrick. "He is now approaching," said Dubhtach. "Take a pair of shears and pretend to be shaving my head, and see what follows." Patrick did as desired. Fiacc ran up and asked breathlessly what Patrick was about. "I want a bishop for the Hy Cinnselach," replied the apostle.

"My uncle is too important a man to be spared for that," said Fiacc, "take me rather than him," and so it was that Fiacc was consecrated bishop. Then Patrick furnished him with a bell, a reliquary, a pastoral staff, and a book satchel; and appointed seven of his clerics to attend him. S. Patrick's conduct in this transaction was one of those happy strokes of genius and tactful arrangement which conduced so largely to his success in Ireland.²

Crimthan, as already stated, had driven the Hy Bairrche out of their land, although MacDaire was his own son-in-law. By the daughter of Crimthan MacDaire had four sons, all of whom were eating out their hearts with rage in banishment. By his second wife MacDaire had an only son, Fiacc.

¹ Life by Joscelyn, c. xii.

² Ibid., p. 189; Liber Hymnorum, ii, p. 31; Tirechan's Collections, Tripartite Life, ii, 345.

The apostle now proposed to Crimthan to surrender one-fifth of the Hy Bairrche patrimony to Fiacc, that is to say, Fiacc's legitimate share of his father's property, and to accept him as spiritual head of the mission in that part of Leinster. To this, probably after some demur, Crimthan acceded. He moreover gave to Patrick some thirty or forty sites for churches in the Hy Cinnselach district, so that at once the Church started well endowed throughout the whole district from the Nore to the sea. By this happy arrangement, some of the wrong done to the Hy Bairrche was redressed, and Fiacc started work among his own people.

The first thing he did was to form a nucleus whence he could work. This he placed at Domnach Fiacc, now Moryacomb, on the borders of Carlow, between Clonmore and Aghold. It is clear that he felt little confidence in Crimthan, so he made his headquarters at some little distance from him. From this establishment he worked the district with the men given him by Patrick; but he did more, he made of this establishment a training school for missionary priests whom he could send as required, to fill the churches among the Hy Cinnselach and the Hy Bairrche, as the gospel made way.

During Lent he was wont to retire unattended to a cave on the north-east side of the doon of Clopook, where the rock rises abruptly a hundred and fifty feet from the plain. It lies directly north-west of Sletty, from which it is distant about seven miles.

Here he not only spent his time in prayer and meditation, but in jotting down memorials of S. Patrick. A hymn on the Life of S. Patrick is attributed to him, but he was not the author; it was a composition of Aedh, the anchorite, of Sletty, who died in 690.¹

From Domnach Fiacc he moved to Sletty, near Carlow, for what reason we do not know, and made that his principal establishment. He had some able and experienced men with him, men who made their mark in the Church. One was Ninnidh or Ninnio, who has been identified with Mancen or Maucan. In Tirechan's Collections towards the Life of S. Patrick, he is called Manchan. Possibly at the wish, or by the advice of the apostle, this man crossed over to St. David's Head, in Wales, and there established the great nursery of saints, Ty Gwyn. The district ruled by Crimthan was too unsettled, and the prospects of disturbance too threatening for Fiacc and Patrick not to desire to have the missionary school removed from Leinster. Another who was with Fiacc was Paul, who succeeded Ninnidh as head of Ty Gwyn, the Paulinus whose inscribed monument is preserved at Dolau Cothi.

¹ Liber Hymnorum, ii, pp. 31-5.

Other helpers were men of experience, but who have left less mark. Cattoc or Cattan, Patrick's priest; Augustine, who had come to Ireland with Palladius, and who, on the failure of that mission, had accompanied his patron to North Britain. After the death of Palladius, Augustine offered his services to Patrick, who placed him with Fiacc.

Others of less note were Tagan or Tecce, an Ossory man; Diarmid, a kinsman of Fiacc, and Fedlemid.

Fiacc had been baptised in or about 460, but Ussher puts it many years earlier, and was consecrated very shortly after and sent on his mission to Leinster.

In 465 a revolution occurred. The half-brother of Fiacc, called Oengus, succeeded in enlisting allies and in stirring up the clansmen between the Nore and the Barrow. A battle was fought and Oengus killed his grandfather, Crimthan, with his own hand. He then recovered his patrimony. Whether his brothers were restored is not known. But the Hy Cinnselach were not disposed to bear their defeat, and retaliated, so that for some years the whole of Leinster was in commotion.

In 480 Finnchad, king of the Hy Cinnselach, was killed by Cairbre, son of Niall, in a battle at Graine, north of Kildare, in which the Leinster men were fighting among themselves. In 489 a desperate conflict took place at Kelliston in Carlow, in which Fiacc's half-brother Oengus was engaged. In 492 Cairbre was again fighting the men of Leinster. The latter were again defeated in 497 or 500.

The condition of the south-east was so disturbed, the country so incessantly ravaged, that Fiacc must have despaired of effecting much till the times were quieter. This was about the period of the migration to Penwith, and although the Irish writers tell us nothing about it, we may conjecture that it was during these commotions that Fiacc went to Cornwall, there to work, and there, maybe, to gather missionaries to assist him, when peace was restored. But he went further, he visited Armorica. The Breton legendary Life of S. Fiacc is late and mixed with fable. It makes him an archbishop of Armagh, who, unable to bear the burden of his office, and the manners of an intractable people, left Ireland, and crossed to Armorica, floating over on a rock that detached itself and served as a ship. He stepped ashore at Pen March; whereupon the rock turned about and swam back to Ireland. A portion, however, of his stone boat is preserved at Treguenec, about four miles from Pen March, and it has in it a hollow in which it is supposed that the head of the saint rested. Pilgrims visit the chapel and place their heads in this depression to be cured of fever, and carry off water in which a relic of the saint has been steeped.

Albert Le Grand supposes that S. Nonna, an Irish bishop to whom the Church of Pen March is dedicated, is the same as S. Vougai, or Veoc, but gives no reason for this identification. Where the saint founded a church was at Lanveock, in the same peninsula. How long he remained there is not known. Thence he went north to Lesneven, and branching away to the east became the founder of a religious house at S. Vougai. A tenth-century missal preserved there long had the credit of having belonged to the saint, and to be invested with miraculous powers.

The origin of the story of his having been elected Archbishop of Armagh is this. He is spoken of in the Lives of S. Patrick as having been the chief bishop in Leinster, and nominated archbishop over all Ireland. But, as Dr. Todd has shown, this is due to a misrendering of the original Irish, which merely stated that he was exalted to be a chief in esteem over all other saints in Ireland.

In the tenth-century Litany of S. Vougai he is invoked as S. Bechue.

The name in Brittany is Vio, Vougai, Veho and Vec'ho. Beside the churches already mentioned of which he is patron, he is also one of those of Priziac, canton of Faouët, in Morbihan, where he is called S. Bého. At the beginning of the seventeenth century the clergy of Priziac wanted to change the dedication of the church to S. Avitus, but met with such opposition from the parishioners that they were obliged to give up the project.¹ These foundations in Brittany, like that in Cornwall, point to his having devoted a portion of his missionary life to the establishment of centres of religion elsewhere beside Ireland. S. Feock in Cornwall belongs to the little Irish cluster, to which S. Kea and Peran-ar-Worthal belong; and they are at no great distance from the cluster at Lizard, where among others was his fellow-worker and friend in Ireland, S. Mancen or Maucan, also called Ninnio, and it is more probable that the S. Nonna of Pen March is this Ninnio, who may have come to Armorica with S. Fiacc, than that it should be another name of Fiacc himself.

To return to his labours in Ireland. He suffered at one time from an abscess in his leg (laboravit fistula in coxa), which made it difficult for him to walk. S. Patrick hearing of this sent him a chariot and horses to alleviate his sufferings; but this excited jealousy in Secundinus, his comrade. Whereupon Patrick told the latter to keep the chariot for himself, and Secundinus did actually retain it for three days, and was then heartily ashamed of himself, and sent it to Fiacc.¹ Nothing is recorded of the death of Fiacc in Ireland, but late authorities assume that he was buried in Sletty; so that it is quite conceivable he may have retired in favour of his son Fiacra, and gone to Cornwall and have finished his days in Brittany. In the Irish Calendars his feast is on October 12; and his death may be put at any time between 510 and 520.

¹ Le Mené, Paroisses de Vannes, ii, p. 237.

Under the name of Vouk or Vogoue he has a church and well in S. Vogou's townland, Wexford, and his feast is there observed on January 20.

S. Feock's feast in Cornwall is on the nearest Thursday to February 2, before or after.

In Brittany he is commemorated on June 15.² In Cornwall not only is S. Feock dedicated to him, but there is also a Saviock in S. Kea's parish, where it adjoins S. Feock. (See also S. VEEP.) Sheviock very probably was also dedicated to this saint, though now under the invocation of SS. Peter and Paul.

In the Exeter episcopal registers the parish church of S. Feock appears as Ecclesia S^{ta}. Feocæ, Bronescombe, 1264, 1267; but as S^{ti}. Fyoci in that of Brantyngham, 1372, and Stafford, 1398.

At Priziac is an early Christian lech, about 9 ft. high, and having the form of a truncated cone, with a hole at the top for the reception of a cross. This is called by the people "le canon de Saint Bého," and there they pretend that he came over from Ireland floating upon it as a log.

Probably in art he should be represented, either with a harp, as he had been trained to be a bard by his uncle, before his ordination; or else with a chariot and horses at his side.

S. FFABIALI, see S. PABAI

S. FFAGAN, Bishop, Confessor

FFAGAN, or Fagan (occasionally Phagan), is represented in the Lucius legend as having been sent, with Dyfan, by Pope Eleutherius to Britain in the latter part of the second century. The two are first mentioned by William of Malmesbury, in his De Antiquitate Glastoniensis Ecclesiæ (written between 1129 and 1139), and by Geoffrey of Monmouth.¹ Sometimes they have associated with them Elfan and Medwy. According to the later embellishments of the legend in the Iolo MSS., Ffagan was "a man of Italy, who came as a bishop to Wales," and was "bishop at Llansantffagan, where his church is."² He was penrhaith, or principal, of Côt Ffagan there,³ and one document credits him with the foundation of two churches, Llanffagan Fawr, now S. Fagans (S. Mary), near Cardiff, and Llanffagan Fach, now Llanmaes (S. Cadoc), near Llantwit Major.⁴ Leland says,⁵ "The Paroch Chirch of S. Fagan is now of our Lady; but ther is yet by the Village a Chapelle of S. Fagan sumtime the Paroch Chirch." To him is dedicated the parish church of S. Fagan, a parish formed (1856) out of Aberdare. He and Dyfan are reputed to have founded the ancient see of Congresbury, which lasted till 721, when it was removed to a village called Tydenton, now Wells.⁶ In a late Iolo list he is entered among the chorepiscopi of Llandaff prior to the time of S. Dubricius.⁷

¹ Tripartite Life, i, p. 241; Life by Joscelyn, c. xii.

² Albert le Grand, and Tresvaux in his additions to Lobineau; Garaby and those who follow him. Not in any of the extant Breviary Calendars.

Ffagan's festival day does not occur in any of the Welsh calendars. Browne Willis,⁸ however, gives it on February 10; Cressy⁹ on August 8; and Ffagan and Dyfan together on May 24. Roscarrock gives May 26, which is also the day on which Lucius is said to have been baptised.

One of the "Sayings of the Wise" stanzas runs:—¹⁰

Hast thou heard the saying of Ffagan,
After showing his declaration?
"Where God is silent it is not wise to speak."
(Lle taw Duw nid doeth yngan).

Ffagan and his companions were probably enough historical persons, whose names were introduced into the Lucius story in the twelfth century. See further under S. DYFAN and S. LUCIUS.

¹ Hist., iv, cc. 19, 20; Bruts, pp. 100-1. He says that they "purged away the paganism of well-nigh the whole island." Wm. of Malmesbury brings them to Glastonbury. Giraldus also mentions them in his Descript. of Wales, i, c. 18 (Opp., vi, p. 202). See also McClure, British Place-names, S.P.C.K., 1910, pp. 197-8

² Pp. 115, 135.

³ Ibid., p. 151.

⁴ Ibid., p. 220.

⁵ Itin., iv, f. 63.

⁶ Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. Angl., 2nd ed., p. 215.

⁷ Liber Landavensis, p. 623. "Pedair Erw Sant Ffagan" (his Four Acres) are mentioned (1709) as in the parish of Llandaff (Cardiff Records, v, p. 399).

⁸ Llandaff, 1719, append. p. 1; Paroch. Angl., 1733, p. 198.

⁹ Rees, Welsh Saints, pp. 86, 316.

¹⁰ Iolo MSS., p. 256.

S. FFILI, Confessor

FFILI, in Latin Filius, was the son of Cenydd and grandson of Gildas.¹ He had a church near that of his father in Gower, called Rhos Ffli, now known as Rhos Sili or Rhosilly,² and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. { bush

Apparently he moved into Cornwall, where Philleigh Church is under his patronage;³ and perhaps Lamphil, or Lan-ffli, on the further side of the Camel to the old chapel of S. James in the parish of S. Breward, may bear his name. Probably he moved, when did his father, to Brittany, to the region of Browercc, where his grandfather Gildas exercised a vast influence.

In the parish of Languidic, the Llan of his father, called Quidi in Breton, is a Kervili, which may preserve his name. But he has most probably been supplanted by S. Philibert at Loc Mariaquer, where there is a village that is called S. Philibert.

Philibert of Grandchamps died in 684. There is a curious story connected with S. Gildas that apparently belongs to Ffli and not to the abbot of Grandchamps.⁴

Four monks—actually devils in disguise—came in a boat to Ruys to inform Gildas that their master, Philibert, was dying, and required his presence to administer to him the last rites. At once he entered the boat to accompany them across the sea. But before leaving, he had a revelation that this was a demoniacal snare laid for him. Nevertheless he accompanied the false monks, taking with him his Book of the Gospels and a little reliquary, hidden under his habit.

The boat started, and when at sea Gildas said to his companions: "Let one manage the rudder, and the rest unite with me in singing Prime; and that we may be more at our ease, lower the sail."

The monks replied: "If we delay, we shall arrive too late."

"That matters not," said Gildas; "duty to God comes first." Then one of them flying into a rage exclaimed: "Confound your prime, we must push on." Gildas, however, knelt down and began to sing Deus in adjutorium. At once boat and monks vanished, leaving the saint alone on the waves. Wholly unconcerned, he spread

¹ Iolo MSS., pp. 109, 137.

² The name is sometimes said to be derived from Reginald de Sully (near Cardiff), who received the lordship on the conquest of Glamorgan by Fitzhamon, but this is a mistake. The name stands for Rhos Sulien, and occurs in the Book of Llan Dâu, p. 239, as Rosulgen.

³ Register of Bishop Brantyngham, Eccl. Sti. Ffli de Eglosros, 1384, 1387; also Bishop Stafford's, 1405.

⁴ Acta SS. Boll., Jan. ii, pp. 956, seq., and the Legendarium of the Church of S. Gildas-des-Bois.

his cloak, seated himself thereon, attached one end of the mantle to his staff to serve as sail, and continued his office.

Thus wafted over the sea, he reached the isle of Noirmoutier, below the Baie de Bourgneuf, in which, as disciple of S. Philibert, he had passed his early years, and found there S. Philibert in rude health, and received a cordial welcome. Having related to his old master the adventures he had gone through, he remained with him some months, and then finding a vessel starting for Ireland went in that to the Isle of Saints. This extraordinary story occurs in the Legendarium of S. Gildas-des-Bois, and in the rhymed office of the saint.

But Philibert was not born till some time after Gildas had been dead. The legend, however, should not be dismissed as worthless. The root from which such a florid crop of fable sprang was probably this. Gildas at Rhuis heard that his grandson, Ffili, at Locmariaquer was ill, and went in a boat to see him. The boat, by the mismanagement of the monks was upset, and all drowned in crossing the mouth of the inland sea, where the current runs with force, except only Gildas, who managed to get ashore. He may possibly have used a strong expression relative to those who had the conduct of the boat, and this has been adopted as a literal description of them. So far from Gildas having been the disciple of Philibert, probably it was Ffili, his grandson, who was his pupil, till he set up for himself at Locmariaquer.

Caerphilly, in Glamorganshire, is believed by some to derive its name from Ffili, but this is as improbable as the other statement that the old hundred name, Senghenydd, is from his father, Cenydd.¹ In Peniarth MS. 118 (sixteenth century), The Book of Dr. John David Rhys, is given an account of the giants of Wales, with topographical particulars; every Cawr, or giant, has his Caer or Castell. After enumerating the sons of the South Wales giant Bwch Gawr, the writer observes, "Some say that Phili was a giant, and a son of Bwch, and had his residence at Caer Phili."²

Ffili's festival does not occur in any of the Welsh calendars. The Mabsant of Rhosilly, however, was, and probably is still to some extent, kept on February 12, the merry-making, until late years, being continued for three days. The Mabsant was celebrated for what was called Bonny Clobby, a kind of plum pudding that was prepared, sold, and largely consumed on these occasions.³

¹ See ii, p. 112.

² So also Rice Merrick, A Booke of Glamorganshires Antiquities (1578), London, 1887, p. 105; Lewis Morris, Celtic Remains, p. 179. With the name compare Kerfily in Elven, Brittany.

³ J. D. Davies, West Gower, Swansea, 1885, iii, p. 162.

S. FFINAN, Abbot, Confessor

A CHURCH in Anglesey, Llanffinan, is dedicated to this saint, who was certainly Irish. No saint of the name occurs in the Welsh saintly pedigrees, though the late *Iolo MSS.*¹ mention a Ffinan of the Côr of Seiriol, at Penmon, Anglesey, who became bishop in the north. He can hardly be Finnian of Clonard, who was associated with South Wales. It is more likely that he is Finnian of Maghbile or Moville. This is rendered the more probable by the Life of this Finnian being included in the collection of John of Tynemouth, who says of him: "Reverendissimus pontifex Finanus, qui et Wallico nomine Winninus appellatur," etc. Although he relates nothing relative to his acts in Wales, he implies in these words that he was known and culled in Wales.

For the Life of this saint we have, unfortunately, but scanty material. A Vita was written by John of Tynemouth, which was taken into Capgrave's collection.

There is also mention of him by the scholiast on the Martyrology of Oengus, as also by that on the Hymn of Mugint in the Liber Hymnorum.

Finnian was son of Cairbre and Lassara. Cairbre was of the Dal Fiatach, the royal race of Ulster, descended from Fiatach the Fair, King of Ireland, who was killed in 119 after a reign of five years.

His parents seem to have been Christians, for he was baptised and sent to S. Colman of Dromore for instruction. Dromore is about eighteen miles south of Carrickfergus in the old Dalaradian territory, and was founded as a school and monastery by S. Colman, about the year 514.

One day whilst with him Finnian had been naughty, and Colman took a whip to thrash the boy. But as he held the instrument of chastisement aloft his heart failed him, and he laid it aside. "It is of no use," said he; "I can't thrash you. You must go to another master, who will be stricter and sterner than myself."²

So the boy was sent to Ninnio at Candida Casa or Whitern, who at the time had a ship on the coast, about to return to Alba. With him he remained many years.

It is most difficult to disentangle, as has already been said, the accounts we have of Whitern from those of Ty Gwyn or Rosnat in Menevia. Both were called "The White House," over both presided a certain Mancen or Ninnio, and both were famous training schools, the Northern Candida Casa for the north of Ireland, the Menevian

¹ P. 144.

² In the legend an angel arrests the arm of Colman.

White House for the south. But in this case there can be little doubt that Finnian was sent to Whitern.

It was a double monastery, in which not young men only, but girls as well received education, and scandals occurred.

Finnian was a handsome young fellow, with long fair hair, on account of which he was called Finnbar, and with so sweet and angelic a countenance, that, as we have seen, Colman was disarmed when he took the whip to his back. And now his good looks won the heart of the daughter of a Scotie king, who had been sent to school at Whitern.¹ There can be little doubt who this was, though not named in the Life. This was Drustic, daughter of Drust, who ruled from 523 to 528. She was an inflammable young lady, and we shall have something more to relate about her presently.

She became so infatuated with Finnian that she fell sick, as he would not pay regard to her advances, and fainted away in the presence of her father. There was clearly a family scene, and Finnian was present. He recalled her to her senses by telling her plainly that he had other ambitions than to become son-in-law to King Drust. And so, says John of Tynemouth, "ad vitam castam et sanctam revocavit."

This statement, however, must be taken with a grain of salt. Very injudiciously Drust sent his daughter back to Whitern, where she soon forgot Finnian, and fell in love with another Irish pupil, named Rioc; and she bribed Finnian by a promise of a copy of all Mancen's MS. books to act as her go-between. Finnian behaved treacherously, for what reason we do not know; and he contrived a secret meeting in the dark between the damsel and another Irishman, named Talmach, in place of Rioc. The result was a great scandal. Drustic, by Talmach, became the mother of S. Lonan.

Mancen, or Ninnio, got wind of this little affair, and was highly incensed. It brought his establishment into disrepute; so he told a boy to take a hatchet, hide behind the oratory, and hew at Finnian as he came at early dawn to Mattins. The boy agreed, but by some mistake Mancen preceded the pupil, and the lad struck at him and felled him. Happily the blow was not mortal. He was saved by crying out, and the boy recognized his voice and did not hew again.²

¹ "Regis Britannie filiam, ipsum carnali amore nimis diligentem . . . justo dei iudicio coram patre et populo post parvum intervallum ab hoc defunctam, parentum et astantium gemitibus compassus ad vitam castam et sanctam revocavit." Vita by John of Tynemouth.

² Finnian of Moville went to learn with Mugint and Rioc and Talmach "et ceteri alii secum. Drust rex Britannie tunc habuit filiam, i.e. Drustic nomen ejus, et dedit eam legendo cum Mugint. Et amavit illa Rioc, et dixit Finniano :

The story occurs in another form in the Life of S. Frigidian of Lucca, who was erroneously identified with Finnian of Moville, and the lost original acts of the latter were employed for the manufacture of those of Frigidian. The composer softened down the circumstances. No mention is made of Drustic' or Rioc or Talmach; but it is said that Mugint, becoming jealous of Finnian's popularity as a teacher, laid a snare for him, which ended in his receiving himself the wound intended for his pupil.¹ Talmach was afterwards accounted a saint, and his day is March 14. His son, Lonan of Trefoit, is commemorated on November 1. After this scandalous affair it was clearly impossible for Finnian to remain any longer at Whitern, and he departed on pilgrimage to Rome. John of Tynemouth hushes up the cause of his departure, and attributes it to his thirst for knowledge, which he desired to quaff at the fountain head. He remained seven years in Rome, and was ordained priest there.

A curious incident happened whilst there. He was preaching in one of the Roman churches, when, probably his strong Irish accent and his bad Latin, so offended the audience that the orchestra was set to bray him down with trumpets. But Finnian would not be silenced; he raised his voice and roared out his homily, drowning all the instruments that were sounded to silence him.¹

*Tribuam tibi omnes libros quos habet Mugint scribendum si Rioc dedisses mihi in matrimonium. Et misit Finnen Talmach ad se illa nocte in formam Rioc; et cognovit eam, et inde conceptus ac natus est Loman de Treocit. Sed Drustic estimavit quod Rioc eam cognovit, et dixit quod Rioc pater esset filii; sed falsum est, quia Rioc virgo fuit. Iratus est Mugint tunc et misit quandam puerum in templum, et dixit ei: Si quis prius in hac nocte veniat ad te in templum, percute eum securi. Ideo dixit quia prius Finnianus pergebat ad templum. Sed tamen illa nocte domino instigante ipse Mugint prius ecclesie pervenit; et percussit eum puer . . . et tunc dixit Mugint 'Parce!' quia putavit inimicos populum populari." Liber Hymn., ii, p. 11.*

¹ Vita apud Colgan, Acta SS. Hib., pp. 634-42. The Life of S. Frigidian is complete from a MS. at Cologne, and the lections for his office at Lucca are excerpts from it. "Unde factum est quod Magister suus Mugentius nomine, qui in civitate quæ dicitur Candida, liberales disciplinas eum docuerat, ubi etiam dicitur episcopali officio vir sanctus functus fuisse; excandens iracundia, cum duobus discipulis qui secum remanserant, nam plures ad B. Frigidianum audiendum convenerant, machinatus est, ut ipsum nocturno silentio dolo perimeret: et quod palam in sancto viro, et Regis filio, facere non poterat, occulte impleverat. Pravitatis ergo consilio firmatus, cum securibus ad ostium ecclesie, discipuli Mugentii accedunt, diligenter custodentes, ut virum sanctum ante omnes ad matutinas surgentem in atrio ecclesie occiderent, et occulte sepelirent, ne tantum nefas ad cujusquam notitiam perveniret. Sed angelus Domini, qui ipsum ex divino mandato ecclesie suæ servare volebat, ei unum de calceamentis abstulit, quod dum circumquaque B. Frigidianus aberrando quæveret, Mugentius ad ostium pervenit ecclesie, ubi ab insidiatoribus B. Frigidiani leva dextraque percussus interiiit. Tandem ut prudens recognoscens reatum suum, continuo exclamavit, Parce Domine, parce populo tuo, et ne des hereditatem tuam in opprobrium. Parce bene Frigidiane, parce laqueum paravi et incidi in eum. Tali ergo confessionis compendio in spe salutis Mugentius vitam finivit." Then Frigidian, as another David, lamenting for the death of his enemy, dismisses his people and goes to Ireland and assumes the habit at Moville.

Two years after his ordination as priest he returned to Ireland, carrying with him relics, a marble altar stone, and three round jewels, such as had not been seen in Ireland before. But above all he brought back with him S. Jerome's version of the Gospels and of the Pentateuch. This is the probable explanation of the words in the Féilire of Oengus, by the scholiast, to the effect that he was the first who brought the Gospel to Ireland, as well as the Law of Moses.

He now founded the monastery of Maghbile, or Moville, in County Down, about the year 540. The name signifies the Plain of the Aged Tree, and it is a curious circumstance that at present near the ruins of the abbey are very ancient yew trees of enormous size. Another of his foundations was Dromin in Louth.

He attended Nathi, the priest placed by Finnian of Clonard in Connaught, when he was on his deathbed, and administered to him the last rites.

Some of his pupils were not in good discipline. One stabbed him with a spear and wounded him, whereupon Finnian cursed him, "May the birds of the air devour your flesh, and may your unburied bones lie scattered on the face of the field, and to hell with your wretched soul!"²

Whilst Finnian was at his second monastery at Dromin, the memorable quarrel ensued between him and S. Columba.

In the course of his scholastic wanderings Columcille had borrowed a Latin psalter from Finnian, which he forthwith proceeded to copy. When Finnian learned what he had done he was incensed, and demanded back the original and with it the copy. Columba refused the latter; whereupon the case was referred to the decision of Diarmidh, King of Meath, who decided against Columba, according to the principle of the Brehon law, that as "to every cow belongs its calf, so to every book belongs its copy."³ "Thereupon ensued a commotion. Columba was a thorough Celt. Christianity, indeed, had spread itself through Ireland, but it was as yet only a thin veneer over the Celtic nature, rash, hot, passionate, revengeful. It had indeed conquered some of the grosser vices, and made them disgraceful. It had elevated somewhat the tone of morals, but it had scarce touched the fiery, unforgiving spirit which lay deep beneath, and still exhibits itself in the fierce and prolonged faction fights of Limerick and Tipperary. In the sixth century the tribal organization of the Irish people intensified this spirit. The very women, and monks, and clergy yielded themselves up to its fascination. . . . Such being the spirit of the age, such being the habits and customs of the time, even in classes most naturally bound to peace, it is no wonder that Columba, a child of the great northern Hy-Neill, took his judicial defeat very badly, and summoned his tribesmen to a contest which, as he represented, touched most keenly their tribal honour. The decision of the king against Columba's claim became, in fact, the occasion of a great conflict between the rival northern and southern branches of the Hy-Neill, which terminated in the battle of Cooldrevny, fought between Sligo and Drumcliffe in the year 561, and won by the Ulster men, the party of S. Columba, when no less than 3,000 of the Meath men were slain." ¹

¹ "Cum populo Romano in ecclesia quadam verbum domini predicaret, quorundam clericorum invidia, ne a populo vox illius audiretur, organa et tubas ceteraque musice modulationis instrumenta simul sonare fecit. Hec tamen omnia altitudine mirabili, virtute divina, vox sua superans commendatur."

² "Carnem tuam volucres celi comedent, et ossa undique dispersa terra non suscipiet, animaque infelix ad inferna sine fine descendet."

³ The copy is still in existence, in the collection of the Royal Irish Academy, see Gilbert's National MSS. of Ireland, pp. 319-21.

Columcille retired to Inismurray. A synod assembled and excommunicated him. Then he consulted his "soul-friend," S. Molaiss, who advised submission and prescribed as a penance that Columcille should retire to Pictland and there labour at the conversion of the natives, in expiation of the scandal he had caused and the blood that he had shed.

Before all this, Finnian had quarrelled with Tuathal Maelgarbh (533-544), King of Ireland, over a small matter. He had asked the king for butter wherewith to feed the lamp by which his disciples read at night, and that the king had refused. Whereupon Finnian cursed him and doomed him to a bloody death, murdered by one of his own servants. And it fell out according to his words; for Tuathal was killed in 544, according to the legend on the same day on which he was cursed. If so, then Finnian knew of the conspiracy against him by Diarmidh, son of Fergus Cearbhal, who had instigated his tutor Maelmor to assassinate the king, which he did at Grellach Eilti, in the Ox mountains in Sligo. By not betraying the plot, Finnian gained the favour of Diarmidh, who ascended the throne after the murder of Tuathal.

Perhaps stirred to emulation by the successes of his rival, Columcille, among the Picts, Finnian also crossed into Alba, according to the ¹ Stokes (G. T.), Ireland and the Celtic Church, London, 1892, pp. 108-10.

Breviary of Aberdeen, and landed at Coningham. Soon after he reached the river Garnoch, and ordered a boy to catch some fish for dinner. But as no fish were caught, Finnian cursed the river, that no man might ever after catch fish in it. On which the river left its channel, and bent its course in another direction. The story has been invented to account for the fact that the river has actually changed its course. Thence the saint betook himself to Holywood, where he founded a branch establishment to his main foundation at Maghbile. Here Finnian set up a cross in honour of the blessed Brigid. The Scottish tradition is that Finnian died in Cunningham, at a place called Kilwinning, as in Scotland he is known as Winnin.

He died after a long sickness in 579 according to the Annals of Ulster and of Tighernach, and the Chronicon Scottorum; but the Annals of Inisfallen, in the Bodleian copy, not that in Dublin, give 572.

S. Frigidian, Bishop of Lucca, has been identified with Finnian of Moville. He was known to S. Gregory the Great,¹ who tells a story of him that has some resemblance to that in the Breviary of Aberdeen, that when the river Auster, now the Serchio, flooded Lucca, he took a harrow, made a trench, and altered the course of the stream. But the Breviary of Aberdeen was drawn up long after that Frigidian of Lucca had been identified with Finnian, and this story was adapted from S. Gregory to a river in Scotland.

So also the fact that Frigidian died in 579 may have induced the compiler of the Annals to put that date down as the year in which Finnian died; and the Annals of Inisfallen, not so influenced, are probably the more correct.

That Frigidian of Lucca was an Irishman is possible enough, and when the compilers of the acts of the saints of that diocese were in quest of material for the lessons in their breviary, they adapted that of Finnian of Moville. But there is nothing in the Life of S. Finnian that lends colour to such an identification. Frigidian* was made bishop in 560, and that was just about the time when Finnian was engaged in his altercation with Columcille relative to the copy of his psalter, leading to the battle of Cooldrevny, fought in 561. The day on which Finnian is commemorated in the Irish martyrologies is September 10, but in Scotland on January 21.

Frigidian of Lucca is commemorated on September 10, and this may have led the Irish martyrologists astray.

It is generally supposed that Llanffinan is dedicated to the disciple of Aidan, who afterwards succeeded him at Lindisfarne,¹ but the parish wake was on September 14,² which agrees rather with the festival of Finian of Moville. Lumphanan in Aberdeenshire is believed to be named after the Ffinan of Llanffinan, and to testify to Welsh missionary efforts among the Transmontane Picts.³ To him Migvie is also dedicated. Not far from Lumphanan is Midmar, dedicated to S. Nidan, a disciple of S. Kentigern.⁴

¹ Dialog., iii, 9.

If we inquire when Finian can have founded his church in Anglesey, we shall probably not be wrong in fixing it as taking place on his journey back from Rome. According to his Life he loitered on the way, doing much missionary work, and converting pagans. It is doubtful whether Finian was a bishop. His identification with Frigidian has conferred on him the episcopal title.

S. FFLEWYN, Confessor

FFLEWYN, or Fflewyn, was a son of Ithel Hael, the father of a large family of Saints who migrated from Armorica to Wales towards the close of the fifth century. In the pedigrees in Hanesyn Hên (Cardiff MS. 25)⁵ he is entered as "Fflewyn in Talebolion," the commote and rural deanery of the name in north-west Anglesey. He is patron there of the little church of Llanfflewyn, subject to Llanrhuddlad, which is the only church known to be dedicated to him. In the *Iolo MSS.*⁶ occurs the following evolved and wholly inaccurate notice: "Fflewyn and Gredifael were saints of Côt y Ty Gwyn ar Dâf, in Dyfed, where they were with S. Pawl of Côt Illtyd superintending the Bangor," the foundation of which is also attributed to these three saints. The brothers Fflewyn and Gredifael seem to have kept together, both having churches dedicated to them in Anglesey.

Fflewyn's festival is given on December 12 in the calendars in John

¹ E.g. Angharad Llwyd, Hist. of Anglesey, 1833, p. 261; Arch. Camb., 1848, p. 55. The statement is founded on the supposition that the church of Llanidan not far distant, is dedicated to Aidan, and not to Nidan, as correctly.

² Nicolas Owen, Hist. of Anglesey, 1775, p. 58; so Angharad Llwyd. Browne Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 281, however, gives December 14, meaning Finian of Clonard. The Ffinan in the Allwydd Paradwys calendar, on Feb. 17, is Fintan, Abbot of Clonenagh, Queen's County.

³ Sir J. Rhys, Celtic Britain, ed. 1904, p. 174.

⁴ Forbes, Kalendars of Scottish Saints, 1872, p. 420; Skene, Celtic Scotland, ii (1887), p. 193.

⁵ P. 115; Myv. Arch., pp. 425-6. Fflewyn is the Latin Flavinus.

⁶ Pp. 112, 114, 133.

Edwards of Chirkland's Grammar, 1481, the Prymer of 1618, and Allwydd Paradwys, 1670. Willis¹ gives the 11th. Nicolas Owen² and Angharad Llwyd³ say, however, that November 12 was his day at Llanfflewyn. They have evidently made a mistake in the month.

S. FFRAID, see S. BRIGID

S. FFWYST.

IN the *Iolo MSS.*⁴ Ffwyst is entered as a saint of Gwent, without pedigree, implying that he is the patron of Llanffwyst, now Llanfoist⁵ near Abergavenny, Monmouthshire. The church is now given as under the invocation of S. Faith, due, no doubt, to lack of any information about its original patron, Faith being the nearest approach to the name.

S. FINBAR, Bishop, Confessor

PATRON of Fowey, Cornwall, where there is a noble church dedicated to him. For short he is called S. Barr. His day, according to William of Worcester, as observed there, was September 26.

In 1336 at the rededication of the church, Bishop Grandisson attempted to get rid of him, by putting the church under the invocation of S. Nicolas; but the old Irish saint has held his ground stubbornly notwithstanding.

The authorities for the Life of S. Barr or Finbar are a Vita Sⁱ. Barri in the so-called Kilkenny Book in Bishop Marsh's Library, Dublin. Another Life in Irish that is fragmentary in the Book of Fermoy; four pages are missing. A Life in Latin in the MSS. of Trinity College Library, Dublin. The Bollandists had a copy of the same Life that is in the Kilkenny Book, but would not publish it in its entirety as not being conducive to edification. The following account is from the Kilkenny Book, a transcript of which has been obtained.

¹ Survey of Bangor, 1721, p. 280.

² Hist. of Anglesey, 1775, p. 58.

³ Hist. of Anglesey, 1833, p. 262.

⁴ P. 144.

⁵ The name occurs under this modern form (Lanfoist) in the Norwich Taxatio, 1254.

Finbar's father was a native of Connaught. His origin was somewhat scandalous, but the story must be given, as it is illustrative of the severe laws that prevailed in Ireland for the preservation of female virtue.

Tighernach was king of Rathluin in Muskerry. His wife had a noble lady staying with her, and at the same time the king had summoned to him a master-smith from Connaught, named Amergin. "The king commanded his household that none of them should form a secret alliance with the lady visitor. Amergin did not, however, hear of the warning, and he bestowed great love and affection to the lady, and her love for him was no less." The king hearing a rumour that all was not as it ought to be, sent for her, and she confessed that she expected to become a mother, and that Amergin was the father. "If this be so," said the king, "it is right that you should be bound together, and scorched and burnt without respite."

The king, so says the story, ordered both to be burnt alive, but a providential rain extinguished the flames of the pyre. The facts were, probably, that he was moved by the tears of his wife and the lady, and commuted the extreme penalty of the law into one of banishment.

When the child was born, the name given to it was Loan, and he was nursed at home for seven years, at which age his father gave him up to some religious men to be educated for the ecclesiastical estate. They brought him to Kilmacahill in the county of Kilkenny, where he remained some years learning to read and acquire the psalms by heart.

One day a monk was cutting the boy's long golden curls, when he was forced to say, "What shining hair yours is!" The abbot standing by said, "Ah! let Shining Hair (Finn-bar) be his name amongst us henceforth;" and so it was, and so is he known to this day.¹

A pretty story is told of his childhood, which indeed at once shows us the kindly simplicity of these old religious men, and of the respect with which the little Loan was regarded by them.

They were about to trace out a new site, or perhaps only new foundations, for their church and monastery. With one accord they agreed to let the innocent little boy with the golden locks bless the site of their habitations and church, because, said they, nothing but good and a blessing could rest on such a site as one thus dedicated.

¹ "Tonsus est secundum verbum sancti senioris. Quando autem tondebatur, dixit senior, Pulcra est coma quam habuit iste. Servus dei alter dixit senior. Bene dixisti quod nomen ejus mutetur et vocabitur Fyndbarr." Cod. Kilken., fol. 133b.

A foster brother of S. David, known in the Lives of S. Finbar as MacCorp, came to Ireland, and our saint placed himself under his direction. Mac Corp, i.e., MacCoirpre, is not known to Irish or Welsh martyrologists. The name means no more than the son of Cairbre. After some years MacCorp persuaded Barr to go with him on pilgrimage to Rome. They went thither, and on their way back, Finbar founded a church in Alba.

In the Life of S. David there is a notice of a visit made to him by Barr on his way back from Rome. Finbar remained with S. David some little while, and then desiring to return into Ireland, and having no boat of his own, S. David lent him one of his own called "the Horse," as it had a figure-head representing that animal. As Finbar crossed over on it, he passed S. Brendan in his vessel "The Sea Monster," and they saluted each other. A picture of the vessel of S. David was painted and framed in gold, and was long preserved at Ferns.¹

Finbar seems to have made acquaintance also with S. Aidan and S. Cadoc.

On his return to Ireland, Finbar founded a monastic settlement on Lough Eirke, at a place that still bears his name, Gongane Barra, or the Chasm of S. Barr. The place soon became famous, and many disciples resorted to him, and he became the head of a large congregation, both male and female.

However, the place was incommodious, and S. Finbar abandoned it for Cloyne, about fifteen miles from Cork, where he remained for seventeen years. But this site did not satisfy his requirements, and he finally migrated to Corcagh-môr, the Great Marsh, as the name signifies, near the mouth of the Lee, and there he founded twelve churches, and about his settlement in process of time grew up the city of Cork. To consecrate the place S. Finbar fasted and prayed incessantly for three days and three nights. The other alternative method was moderate fasting and frequent prayer for forty days. Finbar chose the severer but more rapid method of appropriating and dedicating a site.

In the Life of S. Senan of Iniscathy we are told that that saint took ten foreign monks from his monastery to S. Finbar, but it is difficult to reconcile dates. According to legend, S. Finbar went from Cork to Rome in company with S. Aedh or Madoc of Ferns, S. David and twelve monks, to receive consecration from Gregory the Great; Gregory, however, refused to consecrate him, because it had been revealed to him that Finbar was to receive his episcopal orders in heaven itself. Then comes a nonsensical story of how Finbar and MacCorp were carried up into heaven and were there elevated to the office of bishops, and how a miraculous spring of oil broke out and flowed over the ankles of those who stood looking up expecting the return of the saints. This stuff may at once be dismissed, and we must not be misled by the introduction into the story of Gregory the Great (590-604). For how long S. Finbar remained at Cork after he had founded it we do not know, but there he died and was buried.

¹ Vita S. Davidis in Cambro-Brit. SS., pp. 132-3. In the original the story assumes a fantastic form. The above is probably the nucleus out of which a fable has been formed.

When we come to fixing the date of S. Finbar we meet with difficulties. He was a contemporary of S. David, S. Aidan, and S. Cadoc. S. David's death can hardly be placed later than 589. As we have shown under S. Aidan of Ferns, there were two of this name, and Aidan, the disciple of S. David, died about 625. S. Cadoc is thought to have died in 577. S. Senan, who sent monks to S. Finbar, died 510-20. He was younger than S. Brendan, who died 577.

Leland, quoting from the Life of S. Wymer, i.e., S. Fingar, mentions Barricius as "Socius Patricii," and says that he came to Cornwall, and implies that he did so along with Fingar and Piala. If so, he must have been associated with S. Senan and S. Breaca. Now we are told in his Life that among the holy women under his direction was a Brig, i.e., Breaca. And as we have seen, he was on friendly terms with S. Senan. Leland is certainly wrong in calling him a companion of S. Patrick, but if S. Patrick MacCalpurn died in 493, then it is by no means impossible that he may have seen and spoken with him. But no mention of Patrick occurs in Finbar's Life. Usually Finbar's death is set down as taking place in 623; this we consider far too late, and should rather be disposed to place it at 560.

It remains to give a few of the legendary tales that have attached themselves to Finbar.

As we have seen, the story went that he had been consecrated in heaven. Christ took him by the hand and lifted him up, that like S. Paul, he might see the ineffable glories there. Ever after, that hand blazed with light, so that Finbar was obliged to keep it covered with a glove.¹

One day Finbar was sitting under a hazel-bush with S. Lasrean, talking about heavenly things, and when they were about to part, the latter besought his friend for a token that God was with him.

¹ "Usque ad mortem Sancti Barri visus carnalis manum ejus propter nimiam claritatem suam aspici non potuit, et ideo manica circa eam semper erat," Cod. Kilken., fol. 133.

Now it was in the season of early spring; Finbar prayed, and the hazel-catkins that were swaying about their heads fell off, nuts formed, and leaves appeared. Then Finbar, smiling, filled his lap with ripe hazel-nuts, and offered them to S. Lasrean.

In the Life of Monynna he is said to have visited her monastery. Seeing the approach of the bishop, Monynna was aghast, as in the monastery was only one little barrel of beer to serve for the sisters, and the travellers approaching were many and thirsty. Hastily she had a vat filled with water, and it turned into very respectable swipes. The origin of the story is not far to seek. The good abbess not having a sufficiency of ale, watered down her supply, and S. Finbar courteously assured her that the liquor was so good that he would not drink too much of it.

In the gloss in the Lebar Brecc on the Martyrology of Oengus is a curious story of Finbar and Scuthin meeting on the sea, probably as the former was on his way from Cornwall, and the latter on his way to Rome. Finbar was in a boat, but Scuthin was walking on the water. "How come you to be making your progress thus?" asked Finbar. "Why not," answered Scuthin, "I am walking on a green shamrock-spread plain." Then he stooped, picked a purple flower, and threw it to Finbar, who dipped his hand in the sea, caught a salmon, and cast the fish to Scuthin.¹

Scuthin and Brendan were bosom friends, and the former had been a disciple of S. David.

S. Finbar's Day is September 25. He occurs in all the Irish martyrologies, and in Nicolas Roscarrock's calendar. In Nasmoth's edition of William of Worcester the day is given as September 26, but this is probably a misprint for the 25th.

He is invoked in the Stowe Missal.²

In art S. Finbar should be represented as a bishop holding a branch of hazel-nuts, or with his right hand emitting rays of light.

S. FINGAR, Martyr

THERE are two independent Lives of this Saint. One, by a monk of S. Michael's Mount, Cornwall, named Anselm, has been printed by the Bollandists, in the Acta Sanctorum, Mart. III, pp. 456-9.

The other is by Albert Le Grand, in his Vies des Saints de Bretagne from the Legendaria of the Churches of Vannes and Folgoët.

¹ Féire of Oengus, ed. Whitley Stokes, p. xxxii.

² Warren, Liturgy of the Celtic Church, Oxford, 1881, pp. 238, 240.

Fingar or Guaire the White was son of an Irish king, called in the Latin legend Clyto. This has been supposed to be a misrendering of Olylt, or Ailill Molt, king of Connaught in 449, and king of Ireland in 463, who fell in the battle of Ocha in 478. But there is no other ground for this supposition than a guess that Clyto stands for Olylt, and it is more probable, admitting this, that the Olylt or Ailill, who was the father of Fingar, was the son of MacDairre of the Hy Bairrche, who, with his brothers, was expelled their patrimony by the Hy Cinn-selach from Leinster.¹ When we read in a monastic account that one of the Celtic saints left his country for the love of God, at the head of a swarm of retainers, we may be pretty certain that he was expelled, on account of some dynastic revolution. In the legend there is much solemn fooling over Clyto and Fingar. According to it Fingar was converted by S. Patrick, and when the apostle appeared before his father to preach the gospel, he alone stood up. This is an appropriation from the legends of S. Erc and his half-brother, S. Fiacc. Clyto was so angry that he ordered Fingar to leave the island. Several young men who believed joined him, as did also his sister Piala (Ciara). They took ship and sailed for Brittany, where they were well received by the reigning prince, whose name is not recorded.²

The place of landing is uncertain. S. Fingar is commemorated at both Ploudiri in Finistère and at Pluvigner in Morbihan, but the latter place named indicates that it was there that he constituted his plou or tribe.

The chief of the land gave his consent to his settling there, and Fingar diverted himself with hunting. One day he was in pursuit of a stag, when he was separated from his companions. He killed and cut up the stag and placed the carcase on his horse. As he was covered with blood, he sought a fountain where he could wash; but finding none, he drove the point of his spear into the ground, whereupon a spring gushed forth. Here he cleansed his hands and garments. In the process he saw his own face reflected in the water, and fell into great admiration of his personal beauty. "I really," said he, "am too good-looking a fellow for this world," and he forthwith resolved to devote his beauty to religion; and he set to work to erect a hut of branches near the spring, where he might begin his life of mortification and solitude.³

¹ Anselm does not name the father of Fingar.

² "Terra marique minorem in Britanniam pervenerunt." Vita by Anselm. Acta SS., Mart. iii. p. 456.

³ "Formosi vultus sui pulchritudinem attendens (erat enim speciosus valde et decorus aspectu) coepit laudare Deum, et benedicere, qui tantam ei contulerat gratiam." Ibid., p. 457.

Meantime his companions and attendants were sore troubled at his not appearing, and the prince of the country suspecting foul play, arrested them, and threatened them with death unless they produced Fingar. They represented to the prince that it was antecedently improbable that they should murder their leader on whom they all depended, and that they were obviously incapacitated from finding him if they were locked up in prison. The prince having a mind open to an argument, yielded and bade them scour the country and find Fingar. They searched, and at length came on him in his improvised cell by the fountain. The prince or duke was brought to the spot, and as Fingar professed his resolution not to return to the world, he was granted the whole territory round, free of impost for ever. This is almost certainly the very extensive district of Pluvigner. The name itself indicates it as the place where Fingar established his clan or plebs. It now contains nine daughter churches. The mother church is dedicated to S. Fingar, and his sacred fountain is shown near it.

After some time the desire came over him to return to his native land. He accordingly sailed for Ireland, and on arriving, found that his father was dead, and the members of the sept desired that he should be their chief. To this he would not hearken, but advised that his sister Ciara (the Brythonic form is Píala) should be married to some noble and that her husband should be elected king. But Ciara would not consent to this; she had but one ambition, to join her brother in a religious life. Fingar then advised the sept to leave it to chance, in other words, let there be a general scrimmage to decide who should be their sovereign; as for himself, he would abandon the country.

Accordingly, at the head of seven hundred and seventy-seven men, seven bishops, and with his sister Ciara, he sailed to return to Armorica, but was carried by the winds towards Cornwall.

We may be permitted here to quote the grotesque version of the story as given by Lobineau.

“Étant retourné dans son pays, avec le dessin de convertir à Jesus Christ ses compatriotes, il y refusa la couronne que la mort venait à enlever à son père, et que ses sujets lui présentaient avec un empressement qui marquait bien que ceux qui professent la véritable foi ne manquent jamais de fidélité à leurs souverain légitime.”

Hardly had he started, before Hia, a virgin, who had resolved on accompanying Ciara, came down to the shore, and to her dismay saw the boat already in the offing. But a leaf was floating on the waves. With a stick she drew it towards her, and trusting to God stepped on to it, when the leaf expanded, and she was wafted upon it over the sea, and arrived in Cornwall, where she landed in Hayle Bay,¹ and constructed for herself a cabin, where now stands S. Ives.

Some time later Fingar and his party arrived in the same harbour, and disembarked. On landing, Fingar found a little dwelling in which lived a holy virgin, but unwilling to incommode her, the party passed on and went to Connerton.² Here was a worthy woman who was ready and willing to entertain the party; and, to make beds for them, she at once tore down all the thatch from her roof. She had but a single cow, but that she immediately offered the party. They fell on it, killed, cut it up, roasted and ate it. After that, Fingar collected the bones, and put them into the skin. The entire party, led by the seven bishops, prayed, and up stood the cow, lowed, shook herself, and suffered herself at once to be milked. After this the cow always gave three times as much milk as any other, and from her arose a special breed which continued in Cornwall to the time of Anselm who wrote the legend. The next thing to be done was to restore the roof which the woman "had torn away," and this was accordingly done.

The company now went on their way, eastwards. S. Hia no more appears in the tale. She had apparently taken offence at their sailing without her, and she remained where she had established herself, and lucky it was for her that she did so. News had reached Tewdrig,³ the prince, then at Riviere on the creek opening east out of the Hayle estuary. He did not relish this invasion of Irish, and he armed men and went in pursuit. Fingar and his party had slept at Connerton, and they moved south in a body to the point where now stands the church of Gwinear. Here Fingar and a companion left them to go forward and explore the ground. He came, we are told, to a certain valley, where he sat down. Being thirsty, he drove his staff into the ground, and elicited a copious spring of beautifully clear water, "utriusque duplici saxo decenter inclusus, usque in hodiernam diem copiosa vena fluitare non cessat."

The spring is that at Tregotha, and a very fine spring it is. It has been enclosed and conducted by a drain pipe to flow into a large tank that is walled round.

Meanwhile Tewdrig, "veniens improvisus a tergo," had fallen on the party that was resting on the slope of the hill, and had put them to the sword. Fingar, hearing cries in that direction, retraced his steps, and on surmounting the elevation due south of the site of the butchery, saw what had taken place. Turning to his comrades he said, "See—this is the place where our labours are to be brought to an end. Let us go forward and meet our fate." On coming up to Tewdrig, "You son of a devil," was his choice address, "do your father's work quickly." Then, kneeling down, he extended his neck, and the tyrant at a single blow smote off his head. Fingar had planted his staff at his side, and there it remained, took root and grew into a tree, but of what description Anselm was unable to state.

¹ "Socii, datis velis, æquoreos fluctus secantes, prospero cursu applicuere Cornubiam, ad portum, qui vocatur Heul; ubi jam prævenerat eos sacra virgo Hia," ibid., p. 458.

² "Ad villam quamdam, quæ vocatur Conetconia, pervenerunt," ibid., p. 459.

³ "Sonuerat fama in auribus Theodorici, regis Cornubiæ, in terra scilicet sua Christianum multitudinem advenisse." Ibid.

Almost immediately, the decapitated Saint rose to his feet, picked up his head and walked with it to the top of the hill. But here he encountered a couple of wrangling women, who addressed each other in such abusive terms, that the Saint exclaimed, "I cannot endure this!" and he cursed the spot that thenceforth it should grow no other crop than scolds.

The hill is the bit of moor behind Gwinear, now covered with the refuse of the manor mine. Disgusted at the language employed by the women, S. Fingar turned aside and walked in the direction of Rewala, but coming, in the bottom, to a beautiful fountain, he proceeded to wash his head there, "in quo loco gratissimus fons, jugi rivo usque hodie emanare non cessat."

This well is called Tammi's or Keat's Well, and the cottagers of Relistien have recourse to it for their water. It is not easily found, being in a furze-brake, near another spring and stream. It lies deep, and has steps cut in the rock, or built descending into the water, which is of the purest quality. But Fingar's peregrinations did not end there. Having cleaned his head he returned to the site of the massacre, which at the time when Anselm wrote was divided from the well by a small wood. There Fingar sank on the ground and expired. A copious spring issued from the spot where his head had been struck off, and this was flowing at the time when Anselm wrote, near the tree that grew out of the saint's walking stick.

This spring has been drained away by the mines, and now issues from an adit some way below the church.

If we reduce all this fable to its elements, this is what we arrive at. Fingar landed at the mouth of the Hayle estuary and went to Conner-ton, where he spent the first night. Then he went south. He had outstripped his companions, and was refreshing himself at the Tre-gotha spring, when he was recalled by the cries of his companions.

All the nonsense about the march down hill to wash his head was invented later to give some sanctity to the Tammi's Well; and the curse on the hill was a local joke greedily picked up by Anselm. The well at Tregotha is still regarded with superstitious veneration; recently, a young man whose arm had been broken went daily to it, to plunge the limb in the water, under the belief that this would suffice for setting and healing it.

But to return to the legend. Tewdrig having accomplished his bloody work departed, leaving the dead scattered where they had been slain.

The ensuing night a countryman named Gur dreamed that Fingar appeared to him and bade him bury him decently. Gur woke up his wife, and told her his dream; but she bade him do nothing of the kind, as Tewdrig might resent it. Next day he went out hunting and pursued a stag which fled to the spot where lay the body of Fingar, and fell down before it as if imploring protection of the dead saint. The dogs also on coming up would not touch the stag, but went down on the ground, with their tails between their legs about the sacred body. Gur now at once proceeded to bury Fingar on the spot, and he went about the scene of the butchery burying all the rest. Some time after a church was erected over the grave.

Anselm finishes off the story with some tales of miracles performed later, that are not particularly delicate. Where Anselm, the writer of this wonderful legend, lived, we have no means of telling. That he knew the sites is obvious. He is particular in describing them, but he is most vague relative to sites in Brittany. His narrative is clearly based on popular tradition. There is always some truth at the bottom of such traditions, but it is not always easy to arrive at it.

The truth would seem to be this, that Fingar was obliged to fly Ireland, to save his life. If, as is possible, he were one of the Hy Bairrche who were dispossessed by Crimthan and the Hy Cinnselach, then we have a reasonable explanation. Ailill's brother, later, assassinated Crimthan and recovered his own patrimony; and, perhaps, a rumour to this effect reached Fingar, and he returned to Ireland to try his luck; but the Hy Cinnselach were too powerful, and he was obliged at the head of a fresh party of exiles from the Hy Bairrche country to attempt to return to Brittany, where he had already settled and established a plou. Unfavourable winds, however, drove him on the Cornish coast, and there Tewdrig, who had suffered severely from Irish invasions, slew him and some of his followers. We are not, however, told that either Hia or Piala (Ciara) was put to death.

There were later descents of Irish, soon after, under Breaca and Buriana, and these effectually planted themselves in Penwith and

Carmarth, and then the cult sprang up of their fellow Irishmen who had preceded them.¹

As already intimated, Fingar is honoured not only in Morbihan, but also in Finistère, at Ploudiri, where he is the patron of the daughter church of Loc-equinger. But as there is another commune of the same name with the same dedication in S. Thégonnec, in Finistère, we may conclude that, although the legend says nothing about it, Fingar brought over a second colony from Ireland which he planted in Léon, and this expedition in which he lost his life was actually the third.

Lobineau and the Bollandists put the date of the martyrdom at 455, but this is possibly too early. S. Fiacc, who belonged to the same generation as Ailill, was born about 435 and died about 520. But it is, it must be understood, mere conjecture in making Fingar a son of Ailill of the Hy Bairrche. It is needless to say that no Irish historian knows anything of Clyto. S. Fiacc would, if the identification be admitted, be a half-brother of Fingar, and that may help to account for the incident of the rising out of respect to S. Patrick being transferred from Fiacc to Fingar.

The Church of Gwinear is supposed to mark the site of the martyrdom.

Wilson in the second edition of his Martyrology (1640) gives his day as March 23. The Bollandists follow Wilson and Colgan by mistake on February 23. In Brittany on December 14.² Gwinear Feast is on the Sunday after the first Thursday in May.

In the diocese of Quimper, Loc-equinger is dedicated to him,³ and another place of the same name in S. Thégonnec. At Langon he was venerated as S. Venier, and his sanctuary was resorted to as early as 838. He became invested with the attributes of the Goddess of Love, and was in repute among the amorous. To obviate inconveniences due to this identification, the church has been rededicated to S. Agatha.⁴

In Brittany he is regarded as a bishop. But for this there is no justification in the Life.

S. FINNIAN, Abbot, Confessor

THIS very remarkable man, "master of the Saints" of Ireland, as he was termed, and the principal agent in the restoration of religion

¹ Post tempus aliquod, cum jam vinea Domini Sabaoth, id est Ecclesia Cornubiæ terminos occupare cœpisset; incoata est devotione fidelium super sepulchrum Sancti Martyris basilica." Ibid., p. 459.

² Missal of Vannes, 1530, Brev. Venet., 1589, also 1757, and Albert le Grand, Garaby, etc.

³ Here the Pardons are on September 8, and the Sunday after December 13.

⁴ De Corson, Pouillé, T.V. pp. 42 et seq.

there when it had fallen into decay after the death of S. Patrick and his missionary band, was trained for his work in Wales, and accordingly may well be introduced into this collection.

The authorities for his Life are :—

1. A Latin Vita in the Salamanca Codex, published in Acta SS. Hiberniæ, Edinburgh, 1888, pp. 189-200.

2. An Irish Life, from the Book of Lismore, Anecd. Oxon., 1890, pp. 75-83; transl. pp. 222-30.

Finnian is further mentioned in the Lives of S. Cadoc, S. Ciaran of Clones, S. Lugid of Clonfert, S. Ruadhan of Lothra, S. Colman Elo, S. Columba of Tir-da-Glas, S. Columba of Hy, etc.

The first Life is an important document; it contains mention of some thirty-seven contemporary kings, chiefs, and saints, almost all of whom can be identified and their dates fixed, some precisely, others approximately.

There are, however, certain difficulties to be met; these we will consider, and then proceed to the particulars of the Life of the Saint.

The first of these concerns his baptism.

He is said to have been taken to be baptised by S. Fortchern, but on the way was met by S. Abban, who performed the ceremony. The date of Fortchern is difficult to fix; but Abban, born in 520, died in 590; consequently this would throw the birth of Finnian to the middle of the sixth century or later, but Finnian actually died about 550.

Now the Life in the Salamanca Codex gives the name of the baptiser of Finnian twice, and on one of these occasions as Abbanus. The name is a mistake of a copyist for Albeus, or Ailbe of Emly, who also baptised S. David, and who died at an advanced age in 541. If we make this correction, the anachronism disappears.

The second difficulty concerns the discipleship of S. Finnian to S. Cadoc. This cannot have been, as they were of about the same age or Finnian was somewhat the elder of the two. It is probable that Finnian was a friend of Cadoc, and not actually his pupil.

With these rectifications, the difficulties disappear from the Life of Finnian. Finnian was born about 472-5; he was a native of Leinster, and is variously stated to have been son or grandson of Fintan of the race of Lochain.¹ His mother's name was Talech. When he was born his parents, who must have been Christians, sent him to be baptised by Bishop Fortchern at Roscor, but on the way met Bishop Ailbe (in the text Abban), who proceeded to baptise him. When sufficiently old, Finnian was committed to Fortchern to be educated. Dr. Lanigan supposed that this was not Fortchern, grandson of Laoghaire, who became disciple of S. Loman and succeeded him at Trim in Meath. The period suits. Fortchern held Trim for three days only after his master's death, and then migrated probably to Cill-Fortchern of the Hy Drona in the land of the Hy Cinniselach, between the Barrow and the Blackstairs and Mount Leinster.

¹ The Lives make him the son of Fintan, as does also a Genealogy in the Lebar Brecc. But a Genealogy in the Book of Leinster gives Finain mac Finloga mac Fintan. Anecd. Oxon.—Book of Lismore, p. 342.

At the age of thirty Finnian departed for South Wales, paying a visit to S. Caeman of Dayr-Innis on his way. He had with him his nephew Gabhran, and a friend Buit, and they accompanied S. Cadoc, who had just then visited Ireland.¹

In Wales the friends together founded Melboc (Meibod) and Nant-Carvan.² The circumstances are not told in this way in the Life of S. Finnian. There it is said that he went to Cill-muine. "He found there before him three sages, named David, Gildas and Cathmail. . . . Now when Cathmail beheld Finnian, he looked at him attentively. 'Why this great attention bestowed on the unknown youth that is gone into the house?' asked David. 'Because I perceive great grace in him,' replied Cathmail."

The biographer confuses this visit to Cill-muine with one made considerably later, when Finnian was called in to decide a contention between David and Gildas, and which, if our reckoning be correct, took place in 527, whereas the first arrival of Finnian in Wales occurred in 502-5.

During his stay in Wales an inroad of Saxons took place, and as they were in a valley, Finnian with his staff upset a mountain upon them, and buried them under the stones.³ This incursion is also mentioned in the Life of S. Aidan.⁴ If any Saxons troubled Wales at this period, it must have been some who had made their way in boats round Cornwall and into the Severn Sea.

That Finnian was for a while with Cadoc at Llancarfan is almost certain. A chapel bearing his name existed near it; and the Life says that he was wont to go to the island called Echni, i.e. the Flat Holmes, in the Channel, for privacy, staying with the saints of the place.⁵ These saints, as we know, were Cadoc and Gildas; the former was wont to retreat to it for Lent.

Cadoc, Finnian, and Buit formed the design of visiting Rome, but Finnian was dissuaded by an angel in a dream, who said: "What

¹ Vita S. Cadoci in Cambro-British Saints, p. 36.

² Vita S. Findiani in Cod. Sal., col. 194, "Garbayn alio nomine Nant."

³ Cod. Sal., col. 193; Book of Lismore, pp. 223-4.

⁴ Cambro-British Saints, p. 237.

⁵ Cod. Sal., col. 193.

would be given to thee in Rome that thou canst not obtain here? Go, and renew the Faith in Ireland." The angel that spoke to him was his own Common Sense.¹

Accordingly, bidding adieu to Cadoc, he took ship for Ireland. He landed at Cill-Cairen, i.e. Carnin, in Wexford. He had been, says the author of the Latin life, thirty years out of Ireland. Either he was not thirty when he arrived at Cill-muine, or he was not out of his country for thirty years; for when he arrived in Wexford he was received by Muirdach, the king who died in 525, so that Finnian cannot have well been aged sixty at the date of Muirdach's death. It is possible, but not probable, that he lived to the age of eighty-seven, and that his great work of mastership to the Saints was begun when he was over sixty years of age.

Finnian crossed over with Buit and one named Genoc.² Muirdach son of Aengus, king of Leinster, met him on the shore, and taking him on his back, carried him over three acres.

Some one standing by remarked: "You are a heavy burden to the prince." "He shall have his reward," replied Finnian. "For every acre across which he transported me, he shall have a successor on the throne," or, according to another version: "As Muirdach has received me with joy, even so with joy shall the angels receive him into everlasting habitations. And the yoke of the foreigner shall not weigh on his shoulders."

Muirdach bade him select a site for his ecclesiastical settlement, and he chose several. Moreover he blessed the queen, and she bore a son, Eochu.

At this time probably he revisited Wales, and arrived to settle a controversy between S. David and Gildas, as to which should be master in Menevia. The headstrong Gildas desired to turn David out of his patrimony. By the judgment of Finnian David remained, and Gildas had to quit.³

After having made some foundations in the Hy Cinnsealach country, Finnian visited the Hy Bairrche. He was perhaps induced to do this on account of some unpleasantness having arisen between him and Bressal, the son of Muirdach, who resented the largeness of the grants.

This irritation came to a head when Finnian demanded the site occupied by the royal pigstyes as one whereon to build a church. The altercation grew so hot over this matter, that Finnian lost his temper and cursed Bressal. Shortly after, in a raid made by the Ossorians, Bressal was killed, and as Muirdach may have not unreasonably considered that Finnian had made a sorry return for all the kindness shown him, a coolness ensued between them, and on his death Finnian deemed it expedient to leave that part of the country.

¹ Book of Lismore, p. 224; Cod. Sal., col. 194. From this latter is omitted the significant sentence, "What would be given thee at Rome will be given thee here."

² Cod. Sal., col. 195.

³ Book of Lismore, pp. 223-4. This is not in the Life in the Cod. Sal.

Diarmidh, son of Aengus Guinech, was dead, and his sons, Cormac and Crimthan, shared the rule over the Hy Bairrche, and were jealous of one another. Crimthan was the elder, Cormac the more subtle of the two. Cormac visited his brother and spoke strongly against Finnian as a man of a grasping nature, and urged him to expel the Saint from his territories. But this he did out of low cunning. He hoped to rouse Finnian thereby into cursing his brother, and so bringing down ill-luck on his head.¹

Crimthan fell into the snare ; he went to the church where Finnian was, and ordered him to leave. The Saint refused ; unless turned out by force, he would not budge. A scuffle ensued, in which Crimthan stumbled and broke his ankle on a stone ; and Finnian cursed him that his kingship should come to naught.

What became of Crimthan we are not informed, but his accident and consequent lameness would make him legally incapacitated to wear the crown ; and Cormac became sole king. He abdicated, however, in 535, and was succeeded by his brother Gorman.

Finnian next made an incursion into the territory of the Hy Dunlaing, where he was well received by Cairbre Dubh, who was king of Leinster for eleven years, and died in 546.

One day early Finnian went outside the enclosure of his monastery and found a boy lying asleep under the bank. Some robbers had been making a raid during the night, and had taken the lad with them ; but he was too tired to proceed, and they had abandoned him. So after creeping to the bank, he fell asleep. Finnian hastily procured a pair of shears and clipped his hair. The boy started to his feet, and rubbing his eyes asked what he was about.

"I saw that there was the making of a monk in you," replied Finnian. "Who knows? Perhaps you may rise to be abbot after me."

Then Finnian went to Cluain-Eraird, now Clonard, and on seeing the place, exclaimed : "This shall be my rest for ever. Here will I dwell, for I have a delight therein ;" and he drove a wild boar away that had its lair there, and sat down.

¹ "Propter invidiam quam habebat ad fratrem suum Crimtannum, ut Sanctus Finnianus ei malediceret, suggerebat fratri suo Crimtanno ut sanctum de terra sua expelleret." Cod. Sal., col. 196.

As he sat a druid named Fracan came up, and entered into conversation with him.

Finnian asked the druid whence he derived his wisdom, from above or from below.

"Test me, and find out," replied Fracan.

"Then," said Finnian, "tell me, do you see the place of my resurrection?"

"In heaven, surely," replied the druid.

"Try again," said Finnian, and stood up.

Then the druid, laughing, said: "Now indeed I see the place of your rising. It is where you sat."

"You have hit it," said Finnian. "There shall I be buried and rise again."¹

On this spot Finnian founded his celebrated school and monastery, and pupils streamed to him from every quarter. It was said to have contained during his life as many as three thousand scholars. This was the largest and most important college in Ireland at the time.² In it were educated the Twelve Apostles of the Second Order. Among his most important disciples were Ciaran, the wheelwright's son, founder of Clonmacnois, who died in 548; Brendan of Birr, whose death took place in 571; his namesake, the Navigator, who departed this life in 577; the great Columcille, who died in 597; Columba of Tir-da-Glas, d. 548; Mobi, the Flatfaced, d. 544; Lasrian, d. 570; Sinel, who lived on to 603; Cairnech of Aghaboe, d. 599; Ruadhan of Lothra, d. 584; Senach the Bishop, d. 588. Some of these were past middle age when they joined the community.

Not yet satisfied, but desirous of starting feeders to his great school, Finnian visited Connaught; and having founded churches there, committed them to Dathi or Nathi and to S. Grellan.

He entered into correspondence with Gildas about 550, relative to penitential canons. The Penitential of Finnian is extant, and in comparison with those of Gildas and of David shows that these saints had been in communication, or had at least some common principle on which they based their rules.

On one occasion Finnian visited Tuathal Maelgarbh, who was High King from 533 to 544, and found with him a priest named Mancus, who was in trouble. He wanted the king's horse pastures to build a church in them, and he had asked the king for them ; but Tuathal had refused him. He had recourse to S. Finnian, who overcame the king's objections.¹

¹ The biographer misses the point of the story. He makes the reply of the druid to be a prophecy, showing that the druidic science had a divine origin; but obviously the druid was simply cutting a joke.

² His mother and two sisters, Rignach and Rigenn, joined him at Clonard, and he visited other women, so that he must have had a religious house for women near by, or else Clonard was a double monastery.

Many years ago, before 525, Finnian had preached before S. Brigid, and had so pleased her that she gave him a gold ring. One day a man named Crimthan came to him and asked to be received into the community. But the fellow was a serf to the king of Fotharta, who asked for him an ounce of gold. So Finnian surrendered the ring Brigid had given him, and which weighed an ounce, and with it bought the man's freedom.

In 547 the terrible Yellow Plague broke out in Wales and was carried to Ireland, where it caused many deaths, especially in 548. It continued to rage till 550, when it died away.

Finnian, notwithstanding his age, was attacked by it, and was carried off in 548, according to the Four Masters ; but the Annals of Inisfallen protract his life to 552.

His disciple, Columba of Tir-da-Glas, ministered to Finnian in his last hours, and then himself succumbed to the disorder. Finnian died on December 12, and Columba on December 13. The Irish Life says : " As Paul died in Rome for the sake of the Christian people, lest they should all perish in the pains and punishments of hell, even so Finnian died at Clonard for the sake of the people of the Gael, that they might not all perish of the Yellow Plague." ²

The passage is somewhat obscure, but it seems to imply that the death of Finnian was accepted as an atonement for the people, and the plague was stayed. It goes on to say, that as he died an angel undertook to banish every pestilence from Clonard, and from all Ireland, on account of the fasting of his congregation. We may then place the death of Finnian in 550, at the time when the Plague began to cease.

The biographers revel in a nasty account of how Finnian wore an iron girdle about his waist, that ate into his flesh so that maggots bred there. His daily refection was barley bread and cold water, but on Sundays and holydays he took broiled salmon and ale. He slept on the earth, and had a stone for a bolster.

Finnian was born about 472-5. He probably left Ireland in or about 490, when his master Fortchern died. He returned to Ireland, after having been thirty years in Britain, in the reign of Muirdach, who died in 525. We may place this return in 520.

¹ A droll but not over-delicate miracle was wrought by Finnian to bring the King to submission. " Rex superbus cum ad necessitatem naturæ in campum pergeret, in statione sua penitus rigit." Cod. Sal., col. 206.

² Book of Lismore, p. 229.

On the death of Muirdach he went among the Hy Bairrche, and was in their territory for seven years, till 532. Then he founded Clonard. He cannot have been older than sixty, as his mother was still alive at the time, though suffering from an infirmity that rendered the nursing of her very unpleasant.¹

The visit to Tuathal Maelgarbh probably took place in 533, directly he assumed the crown. Finnian would almost certainly then go to salute the new king and beg something of him.

Finnian of Clonard occurs in all the Irish Martyrologies on December 12, also in the Drummond calendar, and in the Celtic calendar (No. V) published by Bishop Forbes.

In the Welsh calendars Ffinan, i.e. Finnian, is commemorated on December 11 in that in Hafod MS. 8 (sixteenth century), and on the 13th in those in Additional MS. 14,912 (fourteenth century), and the Prymers of 1618 and 1633. Both are mistakes for the 12th.

Whytford has: "In Yrelonde the feest of Saynt Fynang an abbot in whose concepcyon his moder had of him a revelacyon. He cast a water lyke a mere in to the see, and where it was he buylded a monastery. And he ordeyned in an other monastery iii. m. monkes. And he reysed v persones from deth, and turned water into wyne with many other myracles that he dyd as well in Englonde and Wales as in Yrelande, and had also revelacyon of his deth."

Although it is said in his Life that he founded two churches in Wales, "Melboc" and Nantcarfan, it is certain that he was not the actual founder of either; but at Lllancarfan there did exist a chapel in his honour.²

S. FODDWID, see S. MEDDWID

S. FRACAN, Confessor

FRACAN is probably Brychan. He was the second husband of Gwen Teirbron, and the father of Saints James, Gwethenoc, and Winwaloe, and of a daughter Creirwy. He was cousin to Cataw or Cado, Duke of Cornwall,³ but the name of his father is not known.

¹ "Totum corpus ejus est ita infectum quod puellæ servientes horrent tangere eam." Cod. Sal., col. 201.

² Cambro-British Saints, p. 39. "Finian Seoctus," on p. 88, is a misreading for "Finian Scottus."

³ "Fracanus, Catouii regis Britannici, viri secundum seculum famosissimi consobrinus," Vita Sti. Winwaloei in Cart. Landevennec, c. 2; ed. Plaine, Analecta Boll., vii (1888), p. 176. Fragan is a late form of the name.

The material for his Life is scanty enough, mention in the Lives of Winwaloe, and of James and Gwethenoc. The latter has not been printed, but extracts have been made from it by the Bollandist fathers in Catalogus Codicum hagiographicarum, Lat. (in the National Library, Paris), 1889, i, pp. 578-82. "There was in the western parts of Britain a certain wealthy man of great repute among his neighbours, Fracan by name, having a wife of like rank, called in their native tongue Guen, which in Latin is Candida. Divine mercy accorded them three sons, of whom two were twins, the third was born later. The twins were Gwethenoc and James, the third was named Wingwaloe."¹

"Fracan, accompanied by his two lambs, that is, by his two sons, Wethenoc and Jacut, and by their mother Alba (Guen), embarked with a not very numerous retinue, traversed the British sea, and disembarked in Armorica, a forest-clad land, where he learned that the country was free from war; and the north-west wind breathing softly, they were carried to the port of Brahec. In which, looking about, and arriving about the eleventh hour, Fracan found a fairly extensive tract, suitable for the establishment of a single plou, surrounded on all sides by woods and thorn-brakes, since called after its discoverer, and watered by a certain river called Blood (Gouet). There he began to live, along with his company, secure against sicknesses."²

There can be no mistaking where Fracan landed, and where he settled. His boats entered the long narrow estuary of the Gouet, that opens into the Bay of S. Briec, commanded at the time by the ruins of an ancient Roman castle, now called La Tour de Cesson. The hill slopes descended rapidly to the water, dense with foliage.

The inflowing tide swept the boats up, Gwen seated, with her twin boys on her lap, looking wonderingly at the new, wild country where they had come to settle. It was evening, and the stars were twinkling in the sky overhead, and were reflected in the glassy water, the sparkles broken by the ripple as the boats advanced. The tide carried them to a point where through a lateral ravine from the east another stream entered the Gouet. Here they disembarked, lighted fires, and spent the night. Some years later Brioc would land at the same spot and ascend the steep hill, and settle himself in the prehistoric camp that occupied the fork.

¹ "Fuit in occidentibus Britannici territorii partibus vir quidam opulentus et inter convivaneos suos nominatissimus, Fraganus nomine, habens conjugem coequibilem, lingua patria Guen appellatam, quod Latine sonat Candida." Catal. Cod. hag., Paris, p. 578.

² Vita Sti. Winwaloei, ed. Plaine, p. 176.

Next morning, doubtless, Fracan went inland to explore. He had brought sheep and oxen with him, and the place where he had disembarked was hardly suited for them. Ascending the hill, and looking south he saw rising ground that was bare of trees, a furzy down, on which stood up great cairns that covered dolmens, in which the dead of a disappeared race were buried.¹

Collecting his party, and driving the cattle and flock before them, the colonists made for this high ground; and there they encamped, throwing up an earthen bank and surmounting it with a breastwork of stakes and wattles, as a protection against wolves. And here Gwen comforted her weary, sobbing twins, telling them that this was henceforth to be their home.

Would that the historian had told us the year when Fracan disembarked, instead of being so precise concerning the hour.

According to De la Borderie the date was about 460, and this cannot be far wrong.

Possibly Fracan was the earliest settler in this part, but probably not. For Righuel had come over, we do not know whether before or whether he came shortly after, and established himself in supreme authority over all the colonists and such natives as remained. And Meugant was not long in following to found a college at La Méaugon on the further side of the Gouet.

Some little way to the east was the Caer or Castel of Aldor or Audren, the grandfather of Gwen, and where perhaps still lived her father, Emyr Llydaw. It was doubtless the knowledge that there were ties binding the family to British settlers in that part of Domnonia, which had induced Fracan to make for the harbour most convenient for disembarkation in the district over which his wife's family had exercised a rough royalty.

And Gwen speedily put in a claim for tribal land, which was acknowledged; and she was granted a tract of territory, since called Pléquien, north of Castel Audren, and where she also formed a plou, and where to this day her statue remains. Of which more when we come to speak of Gwen Teirbron.

But now the flood of colonists increased. With the first spring weather their boats appeared off the coast, and there was a rapid appropriation of land. These colonists were not, however, all British; Irish came as well in no small numbers. Fracan deemed it expedient to secure a fresh tract, for the overflow of his plou.

By the time that he had come to think this advisable he had to go far afield, and he went into Léon. And he pitched on a spot where the Irish were crowding in thickest; his plou there is now called Saint Frégan. Then he secured another, hard by Plouvien (Plouguen), which was taken in the name of his wife.

¹ The cairns have disappeared, but the dolmens remain.

We are led to inquire, why Fracan should have formed colonies in Léon as well as in Domnonia. We can only conjecture that he was acting in concert with Righuel, his neighbour, who had assumed the sovereignty over Domnonia, and wished to extend his authority over Léon as well. The Kemet Illi, between the Abervrach and the River of Quilimadec, was becoming too Irish; and Righuel may well have urged Fracan to occupy an important district there among them, as a check upon their independence, and to prevent their setting up a prince of their own. This must be matter of conjecture; but we are fain to find a reason for this second double colony so far from the headquarters of his tribe.

A word or two may here be given relative to the organization of these settlements, and we cannot do better than give M. de la Borderie's words:—

“The territory occupied by Fracan, his family and retinue, is called to this day Plou-Fragan. What then is a plou?

“The word exists with slight variations in all the Breton dialects. In Welsh and Cornish it is a parish in the ecclesiastical sense, but rather the body of parishioners than the parish territory. With the Bretons of the continent it has a special signification. The plou is properly the little colony formed by the British immigrants, establishing itself on leaving its boats in a corner of the Armoric desert, under the direction of a brave warrior, a secular chief, or else of a pious monk, the spiritual chieftain over a little society formed in the land of exile, by community of misfortune. On this soil, the plou replaces the clan. In the terrible storm which broke over Britain the clan was for the most part dissolved by the disasters of invasion, and dispersed by the chances of emigration. The plou is derived from it, an image, a modification, a reconstruction on a new basis, linked not by ties of blood, but by those, no less strong, of common suffering, of peril and exile faced and endured in common.

“The civil institution of the plou still subsisted and was full of life in the ninth century, as we may see by the Cartulary of Redon. In that we must study the functions of the chieftain of the plou (in Latin princeps plebis, in Breton mactiern), an hereditary dignity, special to Brittany, and of a very original character. His first and principal privilege was that of exercising judicial authority throughout the plou, over all its inhabitants. The chief possessed beside certain special rights, dues, subventions, and certain lands forming the domain that sustained his dignity. All the plebenses or members of the plou owed to their chief fidelity and assistance, as to a hereditary lord. He could claim their military help if attacked in his person or his goods, and in case of need, to enforce his judgments. . . . The plou must be considered as the elementary social and political unit, as the distinctive and original feature of the British community on the continent. It represents the little colony originally settled on the Armorican soil by the immigrants. And the word remains fixed to the present day, incorporated in the names of some two hundred Breton parishes." ¹

Ploufragan was but four miles distant from the Campus Roboris or Champ de Rouvre, where Righuel had established himself. He had crossed over with a large fleet,² and he planted his court where is now Lishelion (Lis-hoel).

Fracan and Righuel were on very good terms. The former with his small plou could not resist the latter at the head of a host of settlers; he submitted, and they lived in amity.

The forests began to make way for pasture and cultivated land. Great herds of wild horses roamed in the woods, and the colonists made pitfalls and ensnared and then tamed them. And they amused themselves with horse races on the sands of the Bay of Iffignac.³

Meanwhile, Gwen had given to her husband a third son, whom they called Winwaloe, and a daughter, Chreirbia (parvula adhuc puella). And here abruptly ends all that we know of Fracan, except that he sent his three boys to be educated in the island of Lavrea, in the Bréhat archipelago, by a teacher named Budoc.

Fracan is the patron of Ploufragan, near S. Brieuç, and of Saint Frégan, near Lesneven. Formerly he had a chapel in the parish of ¹ Hist. de Bretagne, Paris and Rennes, 1896, i, pp. 281-2. It is to be regretted that M. de la Borderie knew nothing of Welsh authorities for the genealogies of the Colonists, or he might have been led to see much more into the causes of their settlement in certain districts than he has. Indeed, his ignorance on this subject induced him to speak contemptuously of material with which he was unacquainted.

² "Riwalus Britanniae dux filius fuit Derochi . . . Hic Riwalus a transmarinis veniens Britannis cum multitudine navium possedit totam minorem Britanniam tempore Chlotharii regis Francorum, qui Chlodovei regis filium extitit," Mabill., Acta SS., O.S.B., sæc. ii. De la Borderie distinguishes this Righuel from the other spoken of as occupying the Campus Roboris, but without reason. The period (511-561) may apply, and probably does, not to the date of his coming over, but to his establishment of his rule over Domnonia. The totam in the sentence "possedit totam minorem Britanniam" is an exaggeration. He ruled only Domnonia, and perhaps also Leon.

³ Vita S. Winwaloei, ed. Plaine, p. 202.

S. Guen in Côtes-du Nord, which seems to show that this S. Guen was originally Ste. Guen. He is represented as a theatrical king, with breastplate, crown, and mantle, with sceptre in one hand and sword in the other, in a statue of the eighteenth century at Ploufragan.

But the most interesting representation of him is in a painting in the chapel of Lesguen in the parish of Plouvien, where he is figured as a knight in armour, along with his wife, Gwen Teirbron, and his son, Winwaloe.

Garaby records a tradition that barbarians having arrived off the coast of Léon in a fleet so large that the masts resembled a forest, Fracan summoned the British to attack them. The marauders attempted to disembark at Guisseney. The commandant of the leading body of British cried out, "Mil guern!" (A thousand sails!) And afterwards a cross was erected on the spot, called Croas ar Mil guern. Fracan attacked the camp of the pirates, routed them, cut them to pieces, and burnt their ships.

Garaby gives October 3 as the day of S. Fracan, but without stating his authority; and he has been followed by Gautier de Mottai, Kerviller, etc.

Fracan is invoked in the eleventh-century Litany, published by D'Arbois de Jubainville, in the Revue Celtique, iii, p. 449, as Flocan, probably a mistake for Frocan.

S. GAFRAN

THE Iolo MSS. include Gafran, the son of Aeddan Fradog ab Dyfnwal Hên, among the Welsh saints, but there is no authority whatever for so doing. He was one of the "Men of the North," who have been unwarrantably foisted into two documents therein of Achau'r Saint.¹ He was a northern warrior, pure and simple. The only church that has the semblance of a dedication to him is that of Llantrisant, Anglesey, which is generally given as dedicated to the three saints, Sannan, Afran, and Ieuan, where Afran is undoubtedly a mistake for Afan.²

Gafran was in reality the father of Aeddan, and not his son. Aeddan was the celebrated king of Scotch Dalriada, known in the Irish annals as Aidan mac Gabran, who died in 606. Gafran died, according to the Annales Cambriae, in 558. His wife was Lluan, daughter of

¹ Pp. 106, 138.

² See under S. AFRAN, i, p. 116.

FRACAN, GWEN TEIRBRON, AND WINWALOE BEFORE S. CORENTINE.

Painting at Lesguen, Plouviou, Finistère.

Brychan. The names of the father and son were first inverted, it would appear, in the thirteenth-century Bonedd Gwyr y Gogledd in Peniarth MS. 45, and the epithet Bradog, "the Treacherous," is found attached to them both in Welsh literature. Cantire or Kintyre was called by the Welsh Pentir Gafran, his Headland.

Legend has woven itself around him. In the *Triads*¹ he is the head of a retinue designated one of the "Three Faithful Retinues (Diwair Deulu) of the Isle of Britain." The references to them in the two earliest series are rather ambiguous; they showed their faithfulness (1) "when the utter loss took place;" (2) "when the utter loss took place they went to (or, into the) sea for their lord." In the third and latest series the incident is described as one of the "Three Utter Losses of the Isle of Britain." Gafran and his men "went to sea in search of Gwerddonau Llïon (the Green Isles of the Ocean), and were never afterwards heard of". They numbered 2,100. Southey, in his Madoc,² asks:—

Where are the sons of Gavran? where his tribe,
The faithful? following their beloved chief,
They the Green Islands of the Ocean sought;
Nor human tongue hath told, nor human ear,
Since from the silver shores they went their way,
Hath heard their fortunes.

S. GALLGO, see S. ALLECCUS

S. GARAI, Confessor

GARAI, or Garrai, was, according to the Iolo MSS., the son of Cewydd ab Caw. He is reckoned among the saints of Morganwg and Gwent, and said to have been of "Côr Bangor." He is the reputed founder of the Glamorganshire church Llanarrai or Llanharry, now dedicated to S. Illtyd.³

It is not improbable that he is the same as Gwrhai or Gwrai, son of Caw.

¹ Peniarth MS. 45; Myv. Arch., pp. 390, 397, 401, 408.

² London, 1815, i, p. 111.

³ Pp. 107, 146, 222. Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 258, gives his name as Garci.

S. GARMON, see S. GERMANUS

S. GARTHELI, see S. GWRDDELW

S. GASTAYN, or GASTY, Confessor

THE church of Llangasty Talylyn, on the Llangorse Lake, near the town of Brecon, is said to be dedicated to this saint. No saint of the name occurs in the Welsh saintly pedigrees, and had there been we should have expected the initial letter of his name, as patron of Llangasty, to be C and not G. We, however, learn from the Domitian Cognatio that Gastayn was the saint who baptised Cynog, Brychan's eldest son, and that his "church is now situated by Mara."¹ He is said to have been Cynog's preceptor.

In a version,² which is much overdrawn, of the legend respecting the formation of Llyn Syfaddon, or Llangorse Lake—a town, as usual, being swallowed up for the wickedness of its principal inhabitants—Gastayn is made to be the son of "Myfig, the last of the princes of Syfaddon." When every vestige of the city had disappeared a cradle was found floating near the margin of the lake, in which was a sleeping child, which was afterwards baptised with the name Gastayn. In time he embraced the ascetic life, and built his hermitage on the lake's edge, wherein he was afterwards buried. This, we are told, is the Llangasty of to-day.

S. GENYS, Bishop, Martyr

A CHURCH is dedicated to this saint in the deanery of Trigg Minor, in North-east Cornwall, in the midst of a crowd of Brychan settlements; and it has been conjectured that Genys is a substitute for Gwynws, son of Brychan.

S. Gennys stands on the cliffs above the ocean, but in a sweet spot, somewhat sheltered from the furious blasts from the north-west. Pencarrow rears its head four hundred feet sheer out of the surf, and behind it nestles the little church. A couple of springs gush forth hard by, and have worked their way down a glen, among trees and green sward, to a deep valley through which a stream cuts its way to the sea. Between this stream and the sea which folds around it is a finger of steep crumbling rock surmounted by a cliff-castle two hundred feet lower than Pencarrow. To the south of S. Gennys Church the hill falls steeply away to Crackington Cove, where meet two streams that have cleft their way through the hills in deep glens with steep heathery and gorse-clad sides. The loftiest cliff on this coast, starting 700 feet above the sea, is a little further down the coast at Treveague.

¹ The Vespasian Cognatio merely states that Cynog was "carried to the caer and baptised."

² The Red Dragon, Cardiff, 1882, i, pp. 276–81. See, however, the story as told in the Brython for 1863, pp. 114–5, purporting to be from a MS. of Hugh Thomas, the Breconshire antiquary, wherein is no mention of Gastayn, or indeed, any names.

S. Gennys is at the present day far from the beaten track, unreachd by train or coach, a wild and wondrous spot, where a man may be out of the world and near to God. And if this be so now, what must it have been in the sixth century, when the colony of half Irish, half Welsh migrants from Brycheiniog came and settled here.

S. Gennys or Genys was a church under Launceston Priory, and in the calendar of that church, as given by William of Worcester, the Saint is entered as an Archbishop of Lismore in Ireland, and as one of three brothers of the same name, who all lost their heads. S. Genys was commemorated at Launceston on May 2 and 3, and the translation of his head on July 19. In the Tavistock calendar S. Genes is on August 25, but this is Genes the Martyr at Rome, or at Arles, both of whom are commemorated on this day.

That the settlement at S. Gennys was important and a Lan, is shown by the fact that it has its sanctuary, of which several of the fields of the glebe constitute a part.

All that we can conclude with any safety from William of Worcester, who gives us what information we have relative to S. Genys, is that at Launceston and S. Gennys it was supposed that the Saint was from Ireland, that he was different from the Roman or the Arles Martyr, and that he was a bishop.

There was, however, considerable confusion of mind about him; he was supposed to be brother of the other two Saints of the same name, who had their heads struck off, and it was fabled that he had shared their fate.

As to his connexion with Lismore, this is also apocryphal. The diocese was never archiepiscopal, nor was there any bishop of his name there. Lismore Abbey was founded by S. Carthagh, the younger, about 630.

The village feast at S. Gennys is on Whit-Sunday.

There are springs near the church, but no tradition exists as to any of them having been a Holy Well. The church, picturesquely situated.

has been horribly injured by "restoration." It looks like a skeleton from which the flesh has been picked by vultures. The rood screen and old bench-ends were destroyed at this "restoration."

If Genys be the same as Gwynws, he is the same as the founder of Llanwnws in Cardiganshire; and possibly his name may be preserved in Llangenys, a former name for Llandough, near Cardiff.¹ But the identification is most uncertain.

St. GERAINT, King, Martyr

THE name of Gereint, or Geraint, Latinized into Gerontius and Græcised into Gerascen, meets us so often, that it will be necessary to give some account of those who bore the name among the British, of whom record remains.

I. A Gerontius, a Briton, was one of the two generals appointed by the usurper Constantine, to the command of his army. In 383 the legions in Britain had set up Maximus as emperor, and at their head he marched towards Rome; but was defeated and slain in 388. A fresh legion was dispatched by Stilicho to Britain in 396. Soon the troops in Britain set up two new pretenders, Marcus and Gratian; but as they proved incompetent, assassinated them, and elevated one Constantine, a private soldier, selected merely, as we are informed, because of his name, and he was invested with the purple.

For four years, 407-411, he succeeded in holding Britain, Gaul, and Spain under his sceptre. Constantine sent his son Constans to subdue Spain, and Constans having effected this, left Gerontius to hold the passes of the Pyrenees. But Constantine offended the touchy spirit of his general, and in 408 Gerontius revolted and attacked Constantine. He got possession of Constans at Vienne and put him to death, and then proceeded to besiege Constantine in Arles. But the approach of an army sent by Honorius obliged Gerontius to raise the siege, when he was abandoned by the bulk of his soldiers, and fled towards Spain.

"The Spanish soldiery conceived an utter contempt for Gerontius, on account of his cowardly retreat, and took counsel to slay him. They attacked his house during the night, but he, with one Alanus, his friend, and a few slaves, ascended to the top of the house, and did such execution with their arrows that no less than three hundred of the soldiers fell. When the stock of arrows was exhausted the slaves made their escape, and Gerontius might easily have followed their example had it not been for his love to his wife Nuncia, that detained him at her side. At daybreak next morning the soldiers set fire to the house, thus cutting off all chance of escape. Then at the request of Alanus, Gerontius hewed off his head. His wife then besought him with groans and tears to perform the same office for her rather than suffer her to fall into the hands of another, and he complied with this her last request. Thus died one who had exhibited a degree of courage worthy of her religion; for she was a Christian, and her death deserves commemoration. Gerontius then struck himself thrice with his sword; but failing to wound himself mortally, he drew forth the dagger that he wore at his side, and plunged it into his heart." ¹

¹ Iolo MSS., pp. 104, 116.

From what is said of the religion of Nuncia, it seems to be implied that Gerontius was a heathen.

He died in 411, or shortly after.

2. The Welsh genealogies give Saint Geraint as son of Erbin ab Cystennin Gorneu, and as father of Cyngar, Selyf, Iestyn, Cador, and Caw.² Cystennin Gorneu, "the Cornishman," is supposed to have been the Constantine against whom Gerontius revolted, and who was killed in 411. If so, then the date of the death of Cystennin's grandson would be about 475.

Geraint was grandfather of Gildas, who died in 570. Allowing thirty-three years for a generation, this would give 504 for the death date of Geraint; but Geraint died in battle, without attaining to old age, consequently the two calculations fairly agree.

This Geraint ab Erbin is, in the Third or latest series of the Triads,³ said to have been one of the three Llyngesog, or fleet-owners, of the Isle of Britain, each of whom formed a fleet of six score ships with six score men in each, to patrol the coast against Saxon pirates, who in conjunction with the Irish, infested the coast of the Severn Sea.

¹ Sozomen, Hist. Eccl., ix, 13; Zosimus, vi, 1-6; Prosper Aquit., Chron., etc.

² Myv. Arch., p. 421; Iolo MSS., pp. 116, 136. Geraint married Gwyar, daughter of Amlawdd Wledig; Peniarth MS. 27, pt. ii; Hanesyn Hên, p. 121 (not Gwen, as on p. 109, the daughter of Cynyr of Gaer Gawch and wife of Geraint's own son, Selyf). The pedigrees in Cambro-British Saints, p. 269, and Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 120, add to his children a daughter, Silwen, or Sylwein, probably a mistake for Selyf. In the Life of S. Cybi that Saint's pedigree is given as the son of Salomon (Selyf), the son of Erbin, the son of Gereint, the son of Lud (Cambro-British Saints, p. 183). Chrestien de Troyes, in his Erec, the original of the Welsh romance of Gereint and Enid, makes Erec (Geraint) the son of Lac (Lud). Of the same origin, probably, as Geraint is the Irish gerat or gerait, a champion.

³ Myv. Arch., p. 407. In the two first series, pp. 389, 397, the number of men and ships is not given.

The piratical vessels of the enemy entered the mouth of the Parret, reached Llongborth, or Langport, and were there met by King Arthur and Geraint; a battle ensued, in which Geraint was slain.

His death is thus described in a poem to his memory, attributed to Llywarch Hên, who writes as an eye-witness.

In Llongborth I saw a rage of slaughter,
And biers beyond all count,
And red-stained men from the assault of Geraint.

In Llongborth I saw the edges of blades meet
Men in terror, with blood on the pate,
Before Geraint, the great son of his father.

* * * * *

In Llongborth Geraint was slain,
A brave man from the region of Dyfnaint (Devon),
And before they were overpowered, they committed slaughter.¹

This is really about all we know of him.

The Irish High King at the time was Oiliol Molt, and we hear that in his reign there were many contests between the Britons and the Picts and Scots.²

We put the death of this Geraint as taking place roughly a little after 475. It is not possible to assign the Battle of Llongborth to so late a date as that usually given it, 530.

The *Iolo MSS.*³ mention Geraint as lord of Gereinwg, "Geraint's Land," by which evidently Erging is meant, but as a genuine district-name it is simply non-existent. The same documents further state that Geraint is patron of a church at Caer Ffawydd or Henffordd, i.e. Hereford, a statement for which there is no support. It has been surmised⁴ that he founded the church of Pentraeth, in Anglesey, which is sometimes still called Llanfair Bettws Geraint; but this is highly improbable. The church is now dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, with festival on September 8.

In the *Book of Llan Dav*⁵ is mention made of a Merthir Gerein, or

¹ It occurs in the Black Book of Carmarthen, and, with some variations, in the Red Book of Hergest; Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, pp. 37-8, 274-7. One conjecture locates the Battle of Llongborth in the parish of Penbryn, Cardiganshire, where is a farm called Perth Geraint; Theo. Evans, Drych'y Prif Oesoedd, 1740, i, c. 4; Arch. Camb., 1905, pp. 157-8.

² Keating's Hist. of Ireland, trans. O'Connor, Dublin, 1841, ii, p. 25.

³ Pp. 116, 136.

⁴ Rowlands, Mona Antiqua, London, 1766, p. 155; Williams, Observations on the Snowdon Mountains, London, 1802, p. 145.

⁵ Pp. 234, 323. The parish church of "Merthyr Geryn" is entered in the Valor of 1535, iv, p. 377.

Geryn. "This chapel stood," says the late Mr. Thomas Wakeman "near the Upper Grange Farm House, in the parish of Magor (Monmouthshire); its remains have not been removed many years."¹ Magor is on the Caldicot Level, near the Severn Sea, and may have been a Martyrium raised to the honour of S. Geraint who fell at Llongborth. The "Gerein" or "Geryn" of the name stands for "Geraint," as in "Dingereint," which occurs in *Brut y Tywysogion*² as the name of the castle built by Gilbert de Clare in 1108, generally known as Cilgeran Castle, on the Teify. — Welsh Cardigan

Among the "Sayings of the Wise" and the "Stanzas of the Hearing," we have the following:—³

Hast thou heard the saying of Geraint,
 Son of Erbin, the just and experienced?
 "Short-lived is the hater (or hated) of the saints."
 (Byrhoedlog dygasog saint.)

He is the Geraint of the romance, Gereint and Enid.⁴

3. A Gerennius, King of Cornwall, is mentioned in the Life of S. Teilo.⁵ When that Saint fled from the Yellow Plague in 547 to Armorica, he passed through Cornwall and was well received by the king there, Gerennius, and he promised the prince that he would visit and communicate him when he, Gerennius, was dying. Teilo returned from Armorica in 555 or 556. As he was about to embark, Teilo ordered his followers to convey to the ship a stone sarcophagus which he had provided as a present for the king. They declared their inability to get it down to the beach, and objected that its weight would overburden their boat. Teilo then harnessed to the stone coffin ten yoke of oxen, which drew it to the shore, where he launched it on the tide; and the stone cist swam before the vessel, and reached the Cornish coast before them. They landed at Dingerein, the round fort in the parish of S. Gerrans; and Teilo at once proceeded to visit the king, whom he found alive indeed but very ill, and who, after having received the communion, straightway expired, and his remains were laid in the sarcophagus provided for him. We will call this prince Geraint II. He was probably grandson of Geraint I, who fell at Llongborth. He died about 556.

¹ "Supplementary Notes" to Liber Landavensis, 1853, p. 16; also Mrs. Harcourt Mitchell, Some Ancient Churches of Gwent, 1908, p. 21. Willis, however, in his Survey of Llandaff, 1719, append., p. 7, says of it, "Site unknown, otherwise than it stood near Tintern Abbey."

² Bruts, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 289. There is a Cilgeraint also in the parish of Llandegai, Carnarvonshire.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 255; Myv. Arch., p. 128.

⁴ Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, pp. 244-295.

⁵ Book of Llan Ddv, pp. 108, 113-4.

4. There was another Domnonian Geraint, to whom S. Aldhelm wrote a letter in 705 urging the abandonment of Celtic peculiarities of religious use in his realm, and conformity to the Roman rule.¹

This Geraint fought against Ina, King of the West Saxons, at Taunton in 710.²

5. There was again a Geraint ab Carannog, of the race of Cadell Deyrnllwg, who was a prince of Erging, or Archenfield, in Herefordshire. The Welsh pedigrees make him the father of S. Eldad or Aldate, Bishop of Gloucester, who was slain by the Saxons, probably in 577.³ W J O J

In the Life of S. Meven we read that this saint was a son of Gerascenus, King of Orcheus, a district in Gwent.⁴ We can hardly doubt that Orcheus is a misscript for Erchens for Erging, and that Gerascenus is an affected form of Geraint—this same Geraint. Meven was a nephew of S. Samson of Dol, and we may suspect that the sister, who is so harshly spoken of in the Life of that Saint because she declined to embrace the religious life, was the wife of this Geraint.

6. A Geraint, "generous and resolute," is spoken of in the Gododin of Aneurin, as engaged in the Battle of Catraeth, in the Scottish Lowlands. That battle occurred between 586 and 603. This Geraint was a Strathclyde chieftain.⁵ He cannot be identified with any of the others who bear his name.

7. A Gerran is mentioned by Albert Le Grand in his Life of S. Sezni (Setna), but this Life is a deliberate appropriation of that of Ciaran of Saighir, and the chieftain named Gerran in that is none other than S. Ciaran of Clonmacnois.⁶

The church of S. Gerrans is most probably dedicated to Gerennius (No. 3). The palace of Geraint, Din Gerrein, is in the parish, and the earthworks remain. This is probably the Dinurrin from which Bishop Kensteg hailed, who made his submission to Archbishop Coelnoth in or about 866.⁷ It is hardly probable that the patron of S. Gerrans can be Geraint ab Erbin (No. 2).

¹ See the letter in Migne, Patr. Lat., lxxxix, p. 87; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, etc., iii, p. 268.

² Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, sub anno.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 131.

⁴ "Orcheus autem pagus in Guenta provincia hunc protulit, terris generatum patre nomine Gerasceno. Ex qua eadem provincia Sancti Samsonis mater extitit nata." Vita S. Meveni, ed. Plaine, p. 3.

⁵ Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, p. 89. There are several other Geraints mentioned in Welsh literature as having lived at an early period—Geraint Hir and Geraint Feddw in the Triads, Geraint Fardd Glas, and the three Geraints in Geoffrey of Monmouth. Moel y Geraint, or Barber's Hill, is near Llangollen.

⁶ Vies des Saints de Bretagne, ed. Kerdanet, 1837, p. 530.

⁷ Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, etc., i, p. 674. On the coast, in the parish, is Killygerran Head.

Not in genuine T. MSS.

Geraint's tomb was shown at Carn Point, where he was traditionally held to lie in a golden boat, with silver oars. When the tumulus was opened in 1858 a kistvaen was discovered with bones, but no precious metal.

In the registers of the Bishops of Exeter, S. Gerrans is always called Ecclesia Sti. Gerendi.

In Anthony, in Roseland, is Kill-Gerran, the cell of Geraint. In Philleigh parish was a chapel, now ruined; but the wood in which it stood still bears his name. Gerran's Bay and Gerran's Point also recall him.

In Brittany S. Gérard formerly received a cult, but tradition is silent concerning his parentage and history; and we cannot be sure whether Gérard is the Cornish Gerran, the Geraint of the Welsh. S. Gérard near Pontivy had a minihi, or place of sanctuary, always a mark of a considerable and head foundation. But the parish has sunk to a mere tréf of S. Noyala.

S. Gérard had a chapel at Cleguerec.

In Belle Ile, at Le Palais, the parish church bears his name, and there he is commemorated on March 5.

In Brittany the utmost uncertainty reigns as to who and what he was. In the 1589 Breviary of Vannes he is given as a Bishop, on March 5. At S. Gérard he has been supplanted by S. Guirec or Curig. Lobineau conjectures that he was a soldier, the S. Gereon of the Theban Legion at Cologne. Kerviler sets him down as a re-gionary bishop, companion of S. Patrick. But no such a person is known to the Irish, or named in the Lives of the Apostle. He probably depended on the following ballad, preserved by Luzel, as sung at S. Gérard.

S. Gérard went to Rome, not hopeless, nor proposing to tarry,
 But in hopes of obtaining counsel from S. Patrick.
 S. Patrick when he saw him, went forward to meet him.
 See, said he, this little bell!
 See this little bell. Go forward with it over the land,
 Go, and where it soundeth, there tarry.
 On a height near the swelling moors, the bell sounded.
 The angel of God came down to clear the soil of wood and stones.
 Happy folk of S. Gérard, who have your patron in your church.¹

It is possible that when British colonists migrated to Armorica, they set apart portions of land as domains for their hereditary royal chiefs at home, and that the Island of Belle Ile and the district of S. Gérard by Pontivy may have been so given, and that Geraint may have transferred them, or portion of them, to become ecclesiastical settlements. It is rather remarkable that the descendants of Geraint, King and Martyr, have left their names throughout this part of Brittany.

¹ Annales de Bretagne, Rennes, T. ii (1886).

The day of S. Geraint is uncertain.

The village feast at S. Gerrans is on August 10.

The pardon of S. Gérard in Cleguerec is on the first Sunday in August. But that at S. Gérard near Pontivy is on the third Sunday in October. At Le Palais, as already said, it is on March 5.

S. GERMANUS OF AUXERRE, Bishop, Confessor

THE main authority for the Life of this great Saint is a Vita by Constantius, priest, apparently of Lyons. To this Life are prefixed two letters dedicatory, one to S. Patiens, Bishop of Lyons (449–circa 491),¹ another to Censurius, third bishop in succession to Germanus in the see of Auxerre; there is also a prologue.

Constantius professes in the second letter to have revised and amplified the earlier Life that he had written at the desire of Patiens. “The authority of the holy Bishop Patiens, your brother, has required me to retrace, in part at least, the Life and Acts of the blessed Germanus. If I did not do this as well as I ought, I did what I could. My obedience being known to your beatitude, you ordered me to plunge once more into an excess of temerity, in desiring that I should enlarge this little page, which still remained almost in obscurity, and that I should myself come forward in some sort as my own accuser and betrayer.”²

Censurius, to whom this letter dedicatory was written, was Bishop of Auxerre from 472 to 502.

Constantius is by no means an unknown man. He was the friend of Sidonius Apollinaris; his name stands at the head of a collection of eight books of letters, dedicated to him by Sidonius. His name occurs last in a letter of 480. About the year 473 he visited Clermont to allay some difficulties that had arisen there, and Sidonius speaks of him (Ep. iii, 1) then as one “ætate gravem, infirmitate fragilem.”

The original sketch of the life of S. Germanus, dedicated to Patiens, no longer exists, but the amplified Life is found in a good number of ¹ Patiens died a few years before 494; his second successor Rusticus is named as dying in 501.

² A letter was addressed to him by Sidonius about 475.

MSS. It was first published by Mombricitus in Milan in 1480, in the first volume of his Sanctuarium. But this omits prologue and epilogue, and contains many misprints; it contains beside the text of Constantius, a late addition, the legend of the ass the saint restored to life. The dedicatory epistles are omitted, but that one existed in the text used by Mombricitus is shown by the superscription, "Constantius ad Patientem episcopum de vita Sancti Germani episcopi Autissiodorensis."

About a century later appeared an amplified Life given by Surius, in his "De probatis sanctorum historiis," iv, Colon. Agripp., 1573. The Bollandist Peter van der Bosche, in 1731, gave this same enlarged Life in the Acta Sanctorum, July, vii. This second Life contains a good deal that is not to be found in the other and earlier Life; and is, in fact, an early ninth century amplification. This is the Vita most generally used and quoted; but the other is the original text. The additions made were principally these:—

1. The story of S. Amator cutting down the pear tree, and the ordination of S. Germanus as priest, down to the death of Amator, and an ensuing miracle.

2. The story of the interview of Germanus with Genoveva at Nanterre.

3. The absurd legend of the conversion of Mamertinus at the tomb of Corcodemus.

4. The seeking for, finding and translation of the relics of S. Alban.

5. The legend of the revelation as to the day of the death of the Martyr Julian, made to Germanus on his visit to Brioude.

6. The greater portion of the account of the visit of Germanus to the grave of Bishop Cassian of Autun, and of a wonderful dialogue with the dead man.

7. The remarks on the act of the aged bishop carrying on his shoulders a lame man over a stream, when crossing the Alps.

The Life of Germanus by Constantius in its expanded form was submitted to corrosive criticism by Schoele; but he knew nothing of the unadulterated Vita, and had no acquaintance with the MSS. He regarded the whole as a forgery of the sixth century.¹

Next C. Kohler pointed out that all the passage relative to the meeting of Germanus with Genoveva was an excerpt from the Life of the latter saint thrust into that of the former.²

Two years later C. Narbey dealt with the Life, and maintained an impossible thesis, that the original Life by Constantius was to be found in a Gallican missal of the sixth century published by Mabillon in 1685, in snippets of lessons for the Feast of S. Germanus, and in the lections for the same feast in the Breviary of S. Germain des Près and S. Corneille de Compiègne. His thesis is quite untenable; these lections are portions taken almost at haphazard from the unadulterated Life by Constantius.¹

¹ De ecclesiasticæ Brittonum Scotorumque historiæ fontibus, 1851.

² Étude critique sur le texte de la vie latine de Ste. Geneviève in Bibl. de l'École des hautes études, T. xlviii, 1881.

But the final, most complete, and exhaustive criticism, which settles the whole question, is that of Levison, in 1903.²

It is hardly worth mentioning Heric's Metrical Life of the Saint. Heric died circa 876. It adds nothing of value. Even Heric was somewhat staggered at the stories contained in the amplified Life. He says: "This ancient Vita was written with elegance. It was drawn up whilst the memory of the Saint was recent, and whilst many who knew him were still alive. But what is reported . . . is not always very positive, nor very true, on account of the interval that elapsed since his death."

Heric's Metrical Life is printed in the Acta SS. Boll., Jul. vii, pp. 221-5.

The Miracula Sti. Germani attributed to the same Heric are really by an unknown author. Printed in the Acta SS., Jul. vii, pp. 255-283.

It is not our purpose to give the Life of Germanus of Auxerre, but only those portions of it that concern his visits to Britain.

About the time when the Roman legions were withdrawn from Britain, one Pelagius began to teach his heresy in Rome. Pelagius is usually designated Britto or Britanicus, but his bitter enemy and opponent, Jerome, in two places speaks of him as Irish. He began teaching his doctrine on Original Sin in 400, or thereabouts. He probably sent his books to Britain and to Ireland by his disciple Agricola. Indeed, his commentary on S. Paul seems to have been highly valued in the latter island to a late period, and Pelagius himself to have been regarded, not as a heretic, but as an authority on doctrine.³ The orthodox clergy in Britain, uneasy at the spread of the Pelagian heresy, sent to the Church of Gaul for help. Constantius relates that accordingly "a great synod was gathered, and by the judgment of all, two glorious lights of religion were beset by the petitions of the whole body; that is to say, Germanus and Lupus, apostolic priests, who had shown on earth with their bodies, indeed, but in heaven by their merits. And the more urgent appeared the necessity, the more promptly did the devoted heroes undertake the work, hastening on the business with the goads of faith."

¹ Étude critique sur la vie de S. Germain, Paris, 1884.

² Bischof Germanus v. Auxerre, in Neuer Archiv d. Gesellschaft f. ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde, Hanover, xxix, 1903.

³ Zimmer (H.), The Celtic Church in Britain and Ireland, London, 1902, pp. 19-21.

Lupus, the companion of Germanus, was Bishop of Troyes. The date of the mission, 429, is fixed by the contemporary witness of Prosper of Aquitaine, who relates that Germanus the bishop was sent "ad actionem Palladii diaconi" by Pope Cœlestine "vice sua."¹

Some difficulty has been experienced in reconciling the statement of Constantius with that of Prosper, who does not mention Lupus. Prosper, as is a well established fact, set himself to "write up" the Roman see and exalt its prerogatives. But there need be no contradiction. Cœlestine may have heard of the decision of the Gallican Council, and have approved of it. This was not the first time that a Gallic bishop had intervened in British strife. About a generation before this, Victricius of Rouen, summoned to the island by his fellow-prelates in Britain, had gone thither, and had succeeded in establishing peace. What the circumstances were that occasioned this interference, we are not told.²

The bishops crossed the straits in winter, as we learn from the Life of S. Lupus. On account of the roughness of the sea, Germanus emptied a vessel of oil on the waters, and so smoothed them. On their arrival in Britain, their fitness for the work was speedily manifested by their energy and success. The Gallic vernacular was akin to the language spoken in Britain originally, and both had taken into them a large infusion of Latin, so that the addresses of the bishops were probably quite understandable by the people.

"Some sixty or seventy years before, Hilary, the Bishop of Poitiers, dealing in Gaul with the great heresy which preceded this, had found it of great service to go about from place to place and collect in different parts small assemblies of the bishops, for free discussion and mutual explanation. He found that misunderstandings were in this way, better than in any other, got rid of, and differences of opinion were reduced to a minimum. Germanus and Lupus dealt with the people of Britain as their predecessor had dealt with the Bishops of Gaul. They went all over, discussing the great question with the people whom they found. They preached in the churches, they addressed the people on the high-roads, they sought for them in the fields, and followed them up by-paths. It is clear that the visitors

¹ Prosper, Chron., in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, etc., i, p. 16.

² Victricius, De Laude Sanctorum, c. 1 (Migne, xx, p. 443).

This seems very plausible & unlikely theory.
The cities & towns of Gaul surely talked, & then would understand from Gaul could speak to the people, both in town and in country in their own tongue, or in a tongue well understood by them. No doubt the native speech of Gaul and that of Britain were still so closely akin that no serious difficulty was felt in this respect. They met with success so great that the leaders on the other side were forced to take action. . . . They undertook to dispute with the Gallicans in public. The biographer is not an impartial chronicler. The Pelagians came to the disputation with many outward signs of pomp and wealth, richly dressed, and attended by a crowd of supporters. Beside the principals, we are told that immense numbers of people came to hear the dispute, bringing with them their wives and children; coming, in the important phrase of the biographer, to play the part of spectator and judge. The disputants were now face to face. . . . The bishops set the Pelagians to begin, and a weary business the Pelagians made of it. Then their turn came. They quoted the scriptures. The opponents had nothing to say. The people, to whose arbitration it was put, scarce could keep their hands off them. The decision was given by acclamation against the Pelagians.”¹
It - & the same in Britain.

Constantius has doubtless not told us all, and has highly coloured the triumph of Germanus. A Romano-British tribune and his wife brought their blind daughter to the two bishops, and Germanus at once restored the girl's sight by touching her eyes with his reliquary.²

The Britons at this time suffered severely from the inroads of the Picts. Constantius says, Picts and Saxons, and Bede repeats the statement. It has been objected that this is an anachronism, as the Saxon invasion took place in 449. But it is now generally admitted that the Saxons had settled in considerable numbers in the east of Scotland before that date. If so, their alliance with the Picts to break over the Wall and devastate Britain is probable enough. Saxons were in league with the Picts in their onslaughts upon the Britons from a much earlier period. Theodosius, in 369, defeated their combined forces in north Britain,³ and the Count of the Saxon Shore was appointed expressly to guard the east coast against the depredations of the Teutonic marauders. Again in 396 Picts, Scots, and Saxons were in league against Britain, and were defeated by Stilicho.⁴

News having reached the bishops that a fresh invasion of the northern barbarians was menacing the land, Germanus and Lupus accompanied

¹ Browne (Bp. of Bristol), The Church in these Islands before the coming of Augustine, S.P.C.K., 1899, p. 92 et seq.

² This is in the uninterpolated Constantius.

³ Claudian, De Quarto Consulatu Honorii.

⁴ Claudian, In 1^{um} Consulatum Stilichonis.

the British army that marched to arrest its progress. During the march they preached to the soldiers, and most of them, who were not Christians, moved by the exhortations of the prelates, received baptism.

The army, wet with baptismal water, as Bede says,¹ went against the heathen foe in the strength of the Lord. Germanus picked out the most active among the Britons, examined the country, and finding a valley encompassed by hills, drew up his inexperienced troops near it. The fire of military ardour awoke in him, and he took the command of the dispirited Britons, and endeavoured to infuse into them some energy.

When the Picts came on, the Britons remained in ambush till all their foes were gathered in the valley; then Germanus, bearing the standard, started from his lurking-place. The priests thundered the Paschal cry of Hallelujah, for it was Eastertide, the Britons rose, repeated the shout, and burst from their covert. The Picts and Saxons fled in disorder, casting away their arms; and many were drowned in the river.

The Britons, without loss of a man, almost without striking a blow, found themselves in the unwonted position of victors instead of flying, and attributed their triumph to the merits and generalship of their holy leader. To pursue the flying foe, and turn a panic into a rout, and thus strike a serious blow at the power of the invaders, was an effort beyond their capabilities. They were content to gather up the spoil, and return rejoicing to their camp.

The site of this bloodless victory is supposed to have been Maes Garmon, near Mold in Flintshire; but this can hardly have been it, if the Picts were allied with Saxons. If, however, they had been associated with Scots (Irish), then it is by no means improbable. Chester may have attracted the barbarians, and their boats may have entered the Dee. There are philological difficulties also in the way; Germanus would not become Garmon in Welsh, if adopted direct from the Latin.

As the Welsh have preserved no record of the victory, as Gildas does not allude to it, we may well ask whether the story is not the legend of some affair in the north near the Wall, greatly exaggerated by Constantius. Actually it speaks of ineptitude to take advantage of a success, and does little credit to either the Britons or to their leader. Bede knew nothing of it but what he read in the account of the priest Constantius, whose words he quotes almost verbatim.

After having successfully combated Pelagianism, probably in the autumn of the same year, Germanus and Lupus returned to Gaul. The former visited Arles, where he was warmly received by S. Hilary. It is remarkable that, at this very time, the bishops of Gaul, Hilary among them, were labouring at Rome under suspicion of dangerous sympathy with Pelagian doctrines. They—at least those of Gallia Narbonensis—had felt themselves obliged to call in question the teaching of Augustine on Predestination and Grace, and were charged by the fiery Prosper with semi-Pelagianism. In reality they protested against the exaggeration of the doctrines of Augustine, which left no place for human effort and the exercise of free-will. It is remarkable that Germanus, who must have been under the influence of the prevailing anti-Augustinian views of the Gallican Church, should have refuted Pelagianism in its British stronghold.

¹ Hist. Eccl., i, c. 20.

In 447, the year before his death, Germanus went again to Britain, accompanied by S. Severus of Trèves,¹ the disciple of Lupus. Of this Severus nothing further is known. Prosper makes no mention of this second visit; our sole authority for it is Constantius. This silence of Prosper is not enough to make us doubt it. The historic sources of the fifth century but rarely touch on British matters. Indeed, the Chronica Gallica at the year 452 is the sole contemporary authority for the settlement of the Saxons in Britain. In fact, after the year 440 the events in Gaul are hardly alluded to by Prosper. The only incidents he speaks of as occurring there are the invasion of Attila in 451, and the murder of the West Gothic King Thorismod in 453.

On reaching Britain, Germanus was well received by one Elapius, "the most considerable person in the land," and he restored the use of his leg to the crippled son of Elapius. An assembly was summoned, and Germanus induced the Britons to drive into exile the teachers of Pelagianism, as he failed to convince them of their error. After they had been banished, Britain remained steadfast in the Catholic faith.

After a very brief stay the two bishops returned to Gaul, and on this occasion had smooth seas and light breezes, both in coming and in returning.

Germanus died at Ravenna, the last day of July, 448.

We come to a question of some difficulty. Was S. Patrick a disciple of Germanus of Auxerre? Patrick in his "Confessions" does not intimate by one word that he was so; not by one word does Constantius refer to Patrick, and had there been any tradition at Auxerre that the Apostle of Ireland had been a disciple of S. Germanus, this would certainly have been noted, either by Constantius or by the amplifier.

¹ Bede is the authority for Severus being Bishop of Trèves. His name does occur in the catalogue of Bishops of Trèves, but this was not drawn up till the tenth century. Contemporary with Germanus was a Severus, Bishop of Vence, who attended synods at Riez 439, and at Vaison in 442.

The Irish authorities for discipleship are not good.

Muirchu Maccu-Machtheni, who drew up a life of S. Patrick in or about 690, asserts it. Tirechan made a collection of notes on S. Patrick, copied from a book in the writing of Bishop Ultan of Ardbraccan, who died in 656. In this there is no mention of discipleship under Germanus, but Tirechan has nothing to say of the early life of Patrick. To his collection is tacked on a number of anecdotes in Latin and in old Irish, but by whom written and when appended we have no means of judging. They are all of little historic value.

In one of these we have this: "Patrick and Iserninus, that is Bishop Fith, were with Germanus in the city Olsiodra (Auxerre), and Germanus said to Iserninus that he should go and preach in Ireland. Iserninus was ready to obey and go anywhere, save to Ireland. Then Germanus said to Patrick, 'And thou, wilt thou be obedient?' Patrick replied, 'Be it even as thou desirest'. Germanus said, 'This shall be between you. Iserninus shall not be able to avoid going eventually to Ireland.'" ¹

The hymn of S. Fiacc also alludes to discipleship to Germanus, but this hymn was probably corrupted after the publication of Muirchu's narrative. ²

In 431 Cœlestine sent Palladius to the "Scots believing in Christ." It was at the suggestion of Palladius, a deacon, according to Prosper, that Cœlestine commissioned Germanus to proceed to Britain in 429.

Now it is possible that Palladius may have been a disciple of Germanus; and as the Palladius who went to Ireland was also called Patrick, this may have originated the legend.

A second question relates to the traditions preserved by the Welsh relative to Germanus as the founder of monasteries in South Wales, and as consecrating S. Dubricius. We hold that these and other traditions refer to another Germanus, Bishop of Man, and we remit the consideration of them to the ensuing article.

The feast of S. Germanus is on July 31. At Auxerre his body arrived from Ravenna on September 22, was exposed for six days to the veneration of the public, and was buried on October 1. The body was translated on January 6, 859, and all these days were formerly observed in his honour at Auxerre.

¹ In the Tripartite Life, ed. Stokes, ii, p. 343.

² Stokes, notes on the Hymn, in the same, i, p. cxii.

For Germanus or Garmon churches in Wales and Cornwall, see the ensuing article.

The church of Faulkbourne in Essex is dedicated to S. Germanus, and near it is a Holy Well that bears his name. Winterbourne-Farringdon, near Dorchester, is also dedicated to him.

Camden says that at S. Albans, "There is still remaining near the ruins of the city a chapel of Germanus occupying the site of the elevation whence he preached the Word of God, as is testified by old parchments of S. Albans."¹

In Lincolnshire, Thurlby, Scothorne and Ranby are dedicated to the Saint of Auxerre. So is Wigenhall in Norfolk. The dedication to him in Selby Abbey is late, of the eleventh century, due to the possession of a finger of S. Germanus. Two other Yorkshire churches dedicated to him are Winestead and Marske-by-the-Sea, due to the influence of the monks of Selby.

A fragment of a Cornish Mass of S. Germanus exists in a ninth century MS., and in it he is asserted to have preached in Cornwall. "Lucerna et columna Cornubiæ et prece veritatis efulsit, qui in Lannaledensis² ecclesiæ tuæ prato sicut rosæ et lilia floruit, et tenebras infidelitatis quæ obcecabant corda et sensus nostros detersit."³ But this almost certainly is a mistake, and the Germanus who was in Cornwall was probably his Armorican namesake.

The church of S. Germans in Cornwall flattered itself that it possessed the relics of the saint, "Ubi reliquiæ Germani episcopi conduntur." In the proper preface is an allusion to the Saint's opposition to Gwrtheyrn, which helps to identify him with the Armorican Saint, although it also says that he was sent to Britain by the Pope Gregory (590-604), a marvellous assemblage of blunders.

S. GERMANUS, Bishop of Man, Confessor

ALMOST inextricable confusion has been wrought by the confounding together of two Saints Germanus, the one of Auxerre and the other, an Armorican by birth, who died as first Bishop of the Isle of Man. That they were distinct personages is certain.

¹ Britannia, London, 1594, p. 305.

² Lan Aleth, the ancient name of S. Germans.

³ Warren, Liturgy of the Celtic Church, Oxford, 1881, pp. 159-61; also Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, etc., 1, p. 696.

The following are the principal statements made in the documents printed in the Iolo MSS., which have contributed largely to make confusion worse confounded.

"Catwg was principal of the Côt which S. Garmon ab Rhedyw caused to be founded at Llanccarfan, in the room of Dyfrig, when he was consecrated Archbishop of Llandaff, which Côt, together with that of Illtyd, was founded by SS. Garmon and Bleiddan (Lupus) in Wales when they came to this Island to renew faith and baptism.¹

"The religious establishment of the tribe of Cadell Deyrnllwg was Bangor Garmon, called Llanfeithin, in Llanccarfan, and is called Bangor Catwg.

"The tribe of Emyr Llydaw was sent to the Island of Britain to restore faith and baptism, and came in two Côrs. The first came with S. Garmon; and settled in Illtyd's Côt; the second came with S. Cadfan, and fixed themselves in Bardsey.

"The first of the two Côrs that came to this Island was that of Garmon, a saint and bishop, son of S. Rhedyw, of the land of Gaul, and uncle, mother's brother, to Emyr Llydaw; and in the time of Cystennin Llydaw he came here, where he remained till the time of Gwrtheyrn Gwrtheneu, after which he went to France, where he died. He founded two Côrs of Saints, and placed in them bishops and divines, in order that they might instruct the nation of the Cymry in the Christian Faith, where they had erred in their faith. He founded one Côt in Llanccarfan, and placed Dyfrig there as principal, and he himself was bishop. Another near Caerworgorn, where he placed Illtyd as principal, and S. Bleiddan chief bishop there. After that he placed bishops in Llandaff, and made Dyfrig archbishop there, and placed S. Catwg ab Gwynllyw in the Côt in Llanccarfan in his stead, and appointed the Archbishop of Llandaff to be his bishop there.²

"Garmon founded Llanccarfan."³

Among the "Stanzas of the Achievements" is this:—

"The achievement of Garmon—a meek man he—was a skilful work, a fair residence. The establishing of the saints in a Côt—in a secure dwelling."⁴

¹ P. 130; cf. p. 10, where it is stated that Illtyd brought Garmon to Wales at King Tewdrig's suggestion. On p. 39, however, Teilo is credited with having brought him over.

² Ibid., p. 131. On pp. 113 and 119 Dyfrig is said to have been Garmon's periglaur or confessor. He had also as confessors Gwyndaf Hên and Ustig ab Geraint, pp. 108, 131. The Book of Llan Dâu (p. 69) also states that Germanus and Lupus consecrated Dyfrig to be archbishop "over all the Britons of the southern part."

³ Iolo MSS., p. 220.

⁴ Ibid., p. 263.

Bask
Bepu

What is the power of Garmon's name an all worthless in the eyes of the Britons mes.

Among "Other Achievements" :—

The achievement of Garmon, the son of Rhedig,
Was the establishing of order among ecclesiastics,
And Faith, in the anxious day.

Again :—

The achievement of Garmon, the renowned Saint,
Was the obtaining of privilege for saints and churches ;
And the court of demand was the act of Llyr Merini.¹

All is down

The early genealogies briefly state: "Garmon was the son of Ridicus; it was in the age of Gwrtheyrn Gwrtheneu that he came to this Island, from France."²

Now Germanus of Auxerre was in Britain in 429 and in 447. For neither time did he remain long; for the last hardly a twelvemonth, and he died in 448. It is not probable that he founded monasteries during these brief visits. He was busy contending against Pelagianism in gatherings of the clergy and people, and his biographer, Constantius, says not one word concerning his having established religious communities during his visits either in 429 or in 447. Apart from the late and untrustworthy statements just quoted, there is no evidence whatever that Germanus of Auxerre visited South Wales.

Yet according to them he founded Llancarfan and Llantwit, and placed Catwg or Cadoc in the former, and Dyfrig and then Illtyd in the latter.

Dyfrig attended the Synod of Brefi. We do not know the exact date, but it was before that of Victory, the date of which is given in the Annales Cambriæ as taking place in 569. Haddan and Stubbs suppose that it took place but shortly previous. We have given reasons³ for holding that it was held before the outbreak of the Yellow Plague in 547. If we suppose that it was in 546,⁴ then that was nearly one hundred years after the last visit of Germanus. If we take 560, then one hundred and thirteen years after. According to the Annales Cambriæ, Dyfrig died in 612, one hundred and sixty-five years after that same visit. We do not ourselves hold that Dyfrig can have lived to so late a date, but anyhow it is absolutely impossible to admit that he can have been appointed bishop, much less archbishop, by Germanus in 447.

¹ Iolo MSS., p. 264. The Welsh text is evidently corrupt.

² Peniarth MS. 45; cf. Myv. Arch., pp. 416, 425, and Cambro-British Saints, p. 270. Rhedyw for Ridicus seems to occur in the Iolo MSS. only.

³ ii, p. 25.

⁴ After the subsidence of the Yellow Plague it is probable that a synod would be held to regulate the Church thrown into disorder by the death and flight of so many ecclesiastics.

Cadoc was a contemporary of Gildas ; and there is reason for supposing that Cadoc died in 577, one hundred and thirty years after the final visit of Germanus.

Illtyd was a master of SS. Samson, Gildas, and Paul of Léon. Samson died not many years after 557 ; Gildas died in 570 ; Paul of Léon about 573.

Now taking a generation at thirty-three years, this would give the death year of Illtyd as about 537 ; and if he were then aged seventy-seven he was born about 460, thirteen years after the last visit of Germanus.

The anachronism is made the greater by associating Lupus with Germanus in the founding of these monasteries and the appointment of the abbots, for Lupus was in Britain only in 429 ; and this would throw back the formation of these establishments by eighteen years. Whatever allowance may be made for a margin of error, it is impossible to reconcile the statements.

Then, once more, Nennius and the Welsh authorities represent Germanus as a strenuous opponent of Gwrtheyrn, and as encouraging the revolt that broke out against that prince in consequence of his having invited over the Saxons.

It was not till 457 that the battle of Crayford was gained by these latter, and the Britons were driven out of Kent ; and not till 465 that a great victory won over twelve British chiefs at Ebbesfleet showed how serious a menace to Britain these strangers were. It was not till after this that the expulsion of Gwrtheyrn took place ; and Ebbesfleet was fought seventeen years after the death of Germanus of Auxerre.

We are constrained to dismiss as unhistorical all that is said of the association of Germanus of Auxerre with Llantwit and Llancarfan, and with Gwrtheyrn.

But it does not follow that the statements of Nennius and of the Welsh authorities are to be rejected en bloc. It is quite possible that there has been a mistake as to the Germanus who played so active a part in Welsh affairs, political as well as ecclesiastical. There were other Germans or Garmons.

The Welsh pedigrees mention one Garmon ab Goronwy of Gwardog, a Saint of Beuno's Côt at Clynnog.¹ He is unimportant.

The Irish give us two, German mac Guill and Germanus or Mogorman, Bishop of Man.

The first is probably one of the " sons of Goll " mentioned in the

¹ Iolo MSS., pp. 143-4.

Life of S. Ailbe, and of whom we shall deal in a separate article. He flourished about 510.

Mogorman or Mogornan was a son of Restitutus "the Lombard," and of a sister of S. Patrick.

Colgan, in his Trias Thaumaturga (Appendix V, c. iv, p. 227), has a dissertation on this Germanus. He says that Mogornan or Mogorman is the Germanus or Gorman commemorated on October 25 in the Irish Martyrologies; but he confuses him with Germanus mac Guill, commemorated on July 30. He supposes that Restitutus was a native of Armorica, and that Germanus became a disciple of S. Patrick mac Calpurn, and died as first Bishop of Man.

The information we receive relative to this son of Restitutus is not of good quality, and has to be accepted with reserve. But a sufficient amount is available to show us that there was such a man, that he was associated with Patrick, and that he became Bishop of Man.

The title of "the Lombard" given to Restitutus is also rendered "Huy Baird," and is a blunder, a mistranslation of Huy Baird. Restitutus is also spoken of as one of the "Lombards of Letha."¹ Letha is Letavia, i.e. Armorica. There were no Lombards in western Europe at the time of Patrick.

At this period they were seated north of the Danube above where is now Vienna, the old Vindobona. In 512 they overthrew the Herulii, in 566 or 567 they destroyed the kingdom of the Gepidæ and made themselves masters of Pannonia. It was not till 569 that they descended into Upper Italy. In 575, indeed, they crossed the Alps and came down on the Province, where they destroyed Nice and six other cities, but were cut to pieces by Mummolus.²

The Hy Baird of which Restitutus was a clansman was some race in Armorica.

"Patrick and his father Calpurn, Concess, his mother, . . . and his five sisters, namely, Lupait and Tigris and Liamain and Darerca, and the name of the fifth Cinnenum (and) his brother, the Deacon Sannan, all went from Ail Cluade over the Ictian Sea (the English Channel) southward to the Britons of Armorica, that is to say, to the Letavian Britons; for there were relations of theirs there at that time."³

¹ Preface to the Hymn of Secundinus, Liber Hymn., ii, pp. 3, 4. A few Welsh pedigree MSS., e.g., Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 119, and Llanstephan MS. 81, contain the entry, "Garmon gassarvgy (gassarygy) gwr o wlad ryvain," i.e., of Italy.

² Greg. Turon., Hist. Franc., vii, 6; Hodgkin, Italy and Her Invaders, v. pp. 215-24.

³ Gloss on Fiacc's Hymn, Tripartite Life, ii, pp. 413-5. The Book of Leinster

There Liamain is supposed to have married Restitutus, and to have become the mother of Germanus. There also were born the brothers or first cousins of Germanus, Auxilius, Isserninus, Secundinus and Benignus, who worked so nobly in the mission-field with their uncle Patrick.

Sannan the Deacon, brother of Patrick, was the father of another Patrick.¹

Auxilius, Isserninus and Benignus went to Ireland, according to the Chronicon Scottorum and the Annals of Inisfallen, in 438. Who the Hy Baird were we can only guess. Possibly that peculiar race occupying a portion of western Brittany called at present the Bigauden, and having Kalmuck-like features and build.

When Germanus went to S. Patrick in Ireland we do not know. He cannot have remained there long, for we hear little of his labours. He founded one church, Kilgorman, south of Arklow, in Wexford.²

We next hear of him in the Life of S. Brioc. Crossing over from Wexford harbour, which in Irish has borne his name, Lough Garman,³ he landed in Ceritica or Ceredigion, then occupied by Irish, and made the acquaintance of Cuerp, a Goidel chief there, and his wife Eldruda, a Saxon by birth. Cuerp handed over his child Brioc to Germanus to be educated by him, and the Saint took the child along with him to Paris, where Brioc had as fellow pupils Illtyd and Patrick.⁴

The Life of S. Brioc does not identify this Germanus with the Bishop of Auxerre, and we can hardly doubt that he was the son of Restitutus of the Hy Baird of Letha.

The Patrick who was pupil to S. Germanus would seem to have been the son of Sannan the Deacon, and cousin of Germanus; and Illtyd was his great-nephew, grandson of Aldor, who is said to have married a sister of the Saint, and must at the time have been very young.

That Germanus revisited his native land of Armorica and the district of the Hy Baird is more than probable; and the supposition receives some confirmation from the fact of a number of memorials of him being found in Cornouaille, and in a part that leads one to suspect on the Relatives of the Irish Saints has: "Lupait, Patrick's sister, the sons of Hua-Baird, Sechnall, Nectain, Dabonna, Mogornan (Mogorman), Darioc, Ausaille, Presbyter Lugnath." Ibid., ii, p. 549.

¹ Trias Thaum., App. v, c. iv, p. 225.

² Shearman, Loca Patriciana, p. 169.

³ Also in Welsh, Llwch Garmon, in Brut y Tywysogion and the Life of Gruffydd ab Cynan.

⁴ Vita S. Brioci in Anal. Boll., ii, pp. 165-6. The chronology of the Life of Brioc as worked out by Dom Plaine and De la Borderie rests on the assumption that the tutor of Brioc was Germanus of Auxerre. If that assumption be rejected then all their schemes of chronology in the Life collapse.

that the tribe of the Hy Baird, to which his father belonged, was that now represented by the Bigauden.

At Plougastel, to the west of Quimper, and at Pleyben, east of Châteaulin, he is esteemed the patron saint. He is also venerated at Clohars-Carnoet and at Riec by Pontaven.

But this is not all. Traces of two of his pupils, Patrick, son of Sannan, and of Brioc, son of Cuerp, are to be found near to the settlements of Germanus. Not, indeed, of Illtyd, who can have been at the time but a child, and who abandoned the religious life for a military career, to return to it at a later period of life.

In the Bigauden peninsula are chapels of S. Brioc at Beuzic-cap-sizun and at Plobannalec; and these cannot be accounted for by anything in the Life of Brioc after he had become an abbot.

At Riec, where Germanus is patron of the parish, there is to be found a chapel of his pupil, Patrick.

Brioc and probably Patrick were but youths when with Germanus; nevertheless it was part of the discipline of monastic life, for the disciples when young to retire to solitary places for meditation. Thus Paul of Léon when a mere boy went into the wilderness and constructed an oratory and a cell for himself and his young comrades.

Whether Germanus were a native of Pleyben or of Plougastel-Saint-Germain we do not know. We may conjecture that at one or the other he made over his patrimony to the Church, and that then he went to Paris to obtain a confirmation of his grant from the Frank king. At a later period this was done by Paul of Léon, Tudwal, and Samson, and, indeed, by Brioc. Or the visit to Paris may have been undertaken, some time between 450 and 462, for the purpose of entering into closer relations with the Gallo-Roman Church.

The Life of S. Brioc makes no mention of any sojourn in Armorica at this period, and we can do no more than offer the suggestion that Germanus was there along with his pupils.

From Paris, after a while, Germanus departed for Britain.

We may synchronize the return of Germanus with the visit made by the great Apostle of Ireland to Britain in quest of fresh missionaries for his work. This had grown enormously. The fields were white to harvest, but the labourers were few. Accordingly he quitted Ireland to gather assistants. Joscelyn, in his Life of S. Patrick, says: "Sanctus in regressu suo aliquantisper in Britannia propria patria moratus, monasteria multa fundavit, atque a Paganis destructa reparavit. Monachorum sacris conventibus secundum formam religionis, quam eis præfixit, anuentibus ea replevit . . . et triginta episcopos ex transmarinis partibus congregatos, et a se consecratos, in Dominicam messem destinabat."¹ Allowance must be made for exaggeration. What Patrick did was to come to Britain to collect helpers. He founded no monasteries; he had not time to do so, but he may have arranged that nurseries should be established to furnish him with supplies of missioners.

If so, then he would assuredly select his kinsman Germanus, who cannot have been younger than himself, to undertake this task, and this may help to account for the statements in the Welsh documents to the effect that Germanus had a hand in the foundation of Llantwit and Llancarfan.

The date of the visit of Patrick to Britain we do not know. Shearman sets it down as taking place in 462.²

It will have been noticed that we have: (1) Germanus of Auxerre, son of Rusticus; (2) Germanus the Armorican, son of Restitutus; (3) Germanus, son of Ridicus or Rhedyw, according to the Welsh accounts. Germanus, son of Restitutus, we know about through Irish tradition. It is our contention that Garmon, son of Ridicus, and Mogorman, son of Restitutus, are identical, and that the Welsh have confounded the son of Restitutus with the son of Rusticus, a mistake easily made. The fame acquired by the Bishop of Auxerre would tend to eclipse that of the less known prelate of the same name.³

In like manner the scholiast on the Hymn of S. Fiacc informs us that S. Patrick accompanied S. Germanus to Britain to assist in the suppression of the Pelagian heresy. The scholiast is late, and he read somewhere that Germanus and Patrick were together in Britain, and then rushed to the conclusion that Patrick had attended the great Bishop of Auxerre in 429 or 447.

¹ Acta SS. Boll., Mart. T. ii, pp. 573-4.

² Loca Patriciana, p. 452.

³ Sir J. Rhys (Celtic Folklore, p. 39) observes that the name "Garmon can hardly have come down in Welsh from the time of the famous Saint in the fifth century, as it would then have probably yielded Gerfon and not Garmon. it looks as if it had come through the Goidelic of this country." Had Germanus been adopted by the Welsh at a late period Garmon might possibly stand. The combination rm is not unknown in the language; e.g., darmerth, germain, gormes, gormod, etc.

At the same time that Germanus quitted Paris, Brioc departed to revisit his parents in Ceredigion.

We next hear of Germanus in Brecknock, "sent by Patrick." The authority is the Life of S. Ninnoca, and is not good; but it does show that a distinction was drawn between Germanus, the kinsman of Patrick, and the Bishop of Auxerre, and that the former was in Wales. The Life of S. Ninnoca, as we have it, is late, but is certainly based on earlier material; and the statement, "Sanctus Germanus episcopus ex Hibernensium regione transmissus a Sancto Patricio archiepiscopo, venit ad Brochanum regem Britanniae,"¹ cannot be a late invention. No mediaeval hagiographer in Brittany could have invented such a statement, knowing nothing of the son of Restitutus. What he found in the text he amplified and coloured.

We come next to the mass of legendary matter in the Historia Brittonum.

Nennius made his compilation from a Volumen Britanniae, and also from a Vita Germani. Now had there been any account in this latter about his contest with the Pelagians, or the Hallelujah Victory, as there certainly would have been had the Life been one of Germanus of Auxerre, there can be no manner of doubt that Nennius would have mentioned both. But as there is no such matter in his History, we must conclude that the Germanus whose Vita was before him was quite another saint of the same name. Nennius took into his history from the Vita Germani the chapters 32-35; then he interrupted the narrative to follow the Volumen Britanniae; he returned to the Vita Germani for chapter 39; again recurred to the Volumen Britanniae; and after that gave chapter 48 from the Vita Germani. In most of the MSS. he calls the saint simply Germanus, with no mention of Auxerre.

Although the story comes to us in a fabulous form, it contains some historic elements.

The incidents group themselves under two heads: the Transactions of Germanus with Benlli of Powys (known in Welsh tradition as Benlli Gawr, or the Giant), and those with Gwrtheyrn.

One authority for his encounter with Benlli is Marcus, a British bishop, who had lived long in Ireland, and who told the story to Heric, and he or whoever was the author of the book, inserted it in his book on the Miracles of Germanus of Auxerre ; so that already the confusion between the two Saints of the same name existed.

¹ Vita S. Ninnocæ in Cartulary of Quimperlé, Paris, 1896, p. 18.

The tale as told in the Volumen Britannicæ is earlier, and Mark had read it and repeated it from memory to Heric. He does not name Benlli, nor the man who was raised to the throne of Powys in his room. Either Mark had forgotten them, or Heric had not deemed it necessary to record them.

The story as told in the Vita Germani, which Nennius laid under contribution and amplified in 796, is as follows :—

Germanus went to visit Benlli, and to preach to him. When he arrived at the gate of the city, he and his attendants were respectfully received by the porter, who came forth and saluted them. Germanus bade him communicate to the King their desire to enter ; but Benlli returned a harsh answer, declaring that they might remain without a twelvemonth for aught he cared, but he would not permit them to come within.

Evening closed in, and they knew not whither to go. Then one of the king's servants approached, and bowing before the man of God, announced the king's answer, but offered the hospitality of his own house outside the city gates, which they accepted ; and there they were kindly received. The host had but one cow and a calf, and he killed the latter, dressed and set it before his guests. Germanus bade them refrain from breaking a bone of the calf ; and the next morning it was found alive, uninjured.

Early the same day they again approached the gate and sought audience of the wicked king ; and whilst engaged in prayer, awaiting admission, a man covered with sweat issued through the gates, and prostrated himself before them. Then Germanus asked if he believed in the Holy Trinity, and when he had received this assurance, baptised him, and bade him go to Benlli with his message, but forewarned him that he would die. The man on entering, met the prefect ; was seized, bound, and conducted before the tyrant, who ordered him at once to be put to death.

Germanus and his company remained outside the whole day, without obtaining admission.

Then he said to the man who had entertained him : " Take care that none of your friends remain this night within the walls." Thereupon the man brought forth his nine sons. Germanus bade them as well as his attendants fast all night, and he cautioned the man and his sons not to look round whatever might happen. And, lo ! early in the night fire fell from heaven and consumed the city, and all who were therein; "and that citadel (arx) has not been rebuilt even to this day."

Next morning Germanus baptised his host and the sons, and all the inhabitants of the country round; and Germanus promised to the man that "a king should not be wanting to his seed for ever." This man's name was Cadell Ddyrnllug; he became king of Powys in the room of Benlli, and "all his sons were kings, and from their offspring the whole country of Powys has been governed to this day,"¹ "testifying to the tribal character of Welsh chieftainship as that of a ruling family, and not merely of a single person or leader."²

The old line of Cadelling continued to rule Powys till the death in 854 of Cyngen ab Cadell, the last king of that line. They are spoken of as "of Cegidfa," i.e. Guilsfield, near Welshpool, and the fort of Gaer Fawr there was probably their chief seat. Through Cyngen's sister Nest the kingdom of Powys passed to her son, Rhodri Mawr, king of Gwynedd.

As related by Mark the bishop, the story was less marvellous. He must have quoted from a version earlier and in places less expanded than any that has reached us.

In Nennius the man is portarius, but in Mark's version probably porcarius, for Heric makes him the king's subulcus. The night was one of winter, and so cold that it was unfit for man or beast to be exposed to the inclemency of the weather. The story of the calf is given at greater length and with fuller particulars; but nothing is told of the man covered with sweat who was executed. Next morning Germanus and his companions are admitted to an audience with the king, when the Saint roundly scolded the prince, who had not a word to answer. Then Germanus thrust him from his throne with his staff, and bade him surrender his seat to one more worthy to fill it. The king obeyed, and fled along with his wife and children. After that Germanus raised the subulcus to the vacant throne, and thenceforth to this day the descendants of the pig-driver gave kings to the Britons.³

The incident of the calf eaten and restored whole is a pagan myth imported into the story. It is instructive to note how the account of the deposition of Benlli was expanded in later editions of Nennius, with reminiscences of Lot and the destruction of Sodom.

¹ Nennius in Monumenta German. Hist. Chron. Minora, ed. Mommsen, cc. 32-5. In the sixteenth-century metrical legend of S. Cynhafal the destruction of Benlli is attributed to that Saint. See ii, pp. 255-6.

² Seebohm, Tribal System in Wales, 1895, p. 145.

³ De Miracul. S. Germani, ed. Migne, p. 124; also given by Mommsen as above, pp. 172-3.

What actually occurred was apparently this. Benlli, king of Powys, had incurred the dislike of a large number of his people, and Germanus sanctioned an insurrection under Cadell, and cursed the king in true Celtic fashion. The insurgents prevailed. Benlli was expelled, and Cadell Ddyrnllug¹ was the first of a new line of kings of Powys.

Benlli Gawr was king in Iâl, a district lying between Ruthin and Mold, and extending towards Llangollen; and the conical mountain, Moel Fenlli, in the Clwydian range, takes its name from him, and the fort crowning it is generally believed to be the arx of Nennius. His son, Beli, is mentioned in Englynion y Beddau in the twelfth-century *Black Book of Carmarthen*²:—

Whose the grave on the Maes Mawr?
Proud his hand upon his lance—
The grave of Beli ab Benlli Gawr.

The two stones set up to mark the grave existed till about 1600 at a place of the name on the Nant-y-Meini brook, which rises on the Nerquis mountain. Cadell apparently rewarded Germanus with grants of land in Iâl, and the Germanus churches in Denbighshire owe their origin to this. We cannot attribute them to the Bishop of Auxerre.

A legend of a similar character is told by the Welsh historian, Humphrey Lhuyd, of Germanus (whom he confounds with his namesake of Auxerre) in his Breviary of Britayne, published in 1573, wherein he connects him with Llynclys, near Oswestry. The then king of Powys had his palace on the spot where now stands Llynclys Pool. "The kynge whereof, bycause he refused to heare that good man, by the secret and terrible iudgement of God, with his Palace, and all his householde, was swallowed vp into the bowels of the Earth in that place, whereas, not farre from Oswastry, is now a standyng water, of an vnknowne depth, called Lhunclys, that is to say, the deuouryng of the Palace."³

¹ The Durnluc of Catell Durnluc has nothing to do with the supposed district-name Teyrnllwg (Tolo MSS., p. 86), the traditional name of the district comprised in the old Diocese of Chester, and whence "Vale Royal," applied to a district in Cheshire, was translated. Cadell Ddyrnllug seems to mean Cadell of the Black Hand (Mr. Egerton Phillimore in Y Cymmrodor, viii, p. 119; ix, p. 179).

² Ed. Dr. J. G. Evans, 1906, p. 69. Beli was slain in battle by Meirion ab Tybion, who also set up the stones to mark his grave (Peniarth MS. 267, and Llanstephan MS. 18).

³ The Breviary is a translation by Twyne of Lhuyd's work in Latin published in 1572 at Cologne. Llynclys means, more correctly, "the swallowed court." There are other legends of the origin of the Pool; see Sir J. Rhys, Celtic Folklore, pp. 410-4.

The next political movement in which Germanus was engaged was one against Gwrtheyrn.

Although the invitation to the Jutes to assist the Britons against the Picts had been sent, not on Gwrtheyrn's sole initiative, but by decision of a council of the chiefs, as Gildas assures us,¹ yet when the disastrous results became manifest, indignation and resentment broke out against Gwrtheyrn himself, and a conjuration was formed against him, headed by Ambrosius Aurelianus, of Roman imperial descent. In characteristic fashion a Saint was invoked to bless the conspirators and to ban Gwrtheyrn. Germanus was fixed on, and a great Council of the chieftains and clergy was assembled, to criminate and condemn the king. Gwrtheyrn had added to his incapacity as a ruler, the crime of seducing his own daughter.

"And when a great synod of clerics and laity was gathered in one council," Gwrtheyrn bade his daughter bring in the child she had borne him, and place it in the lap of Germanus and declare that he, the bishop, was its father.

Germanus received the child, and called for a comb and razor and shears, and bade the child offer them to his true father after the flesh, whereupon the boy handed them to the king. Gwrtheyrn rose up in a fury, and fled from the face of Germanus and the council. Then he invited magi, i.e. Druids, to him. Next follows the fable of Ambrosius Merlin, and the attempt made by Gwrtheyrn to build a castle in Eryri, or the Snowdon district. From this he was also driven, and he departed with his wise men (Druids in the Irish Nennius) to the sinistral district, and arrived in the region named Gworthehirniaun.² Thither Germanus again pursued him, along with his following of British clergy; and mounting a rock, he prayed against him for forty days and nights. Then Gwrtheyrn fled again to the castle that bore his name near the river Teifi. Once more the implacable Germanus went after him, and fasted and prayed against him for three days and as many nights. And on the fourth night fire fell from heaven and consumed the wicked king, with his wives and all his followers. "Hic est finis Guorthegirni, ut in Libro beati Germani repperi. Alii autem aliter dixerunt."³ The author proceeds to say that this differs from the current tradition that represents Gwrtheyrn as wandering about the country, scorned by all, till he died of a broken heart.

In the foregoing account the incest of the king is put in the fore-

¹ De Excid. Brit., ed. Williams, pp. 52, 54; ed. Mommsen, p. 38.

² The commote is now in Radnorshire, the chief place in it being Rhayader. It was regarded at one time as being in Powys.

³ Nennius, ed. Mommsen, c. 47, pp. 190-1.

S. GERMANUS.
Stained Glass, S. Neot.

front as the principal cause of the assembly of the Council ; that this was not so, we may rest assured. The Britons were far more concerned over the conquests of the Jutes and Saxons than about the private morals of the king.

The child put into the arms of Germanus is called in the text Sanctus Faustus ; but he cannot have been Faustus of Riez, but Edeyrn, who built a monastery at Llanedarn, in Glamorganshire.

Gwrtheyrn would seem to have thrown himself into the arms of the pagan party, for he summoned to him twelve magi or Druids who advised him to offer a human sacrifice.

The reason why Germanus went after him the second time was probably this. Nennius tells us that a great meeting was held between the Saxons and the Britons, for convivial purposes, and that at the banquet the Saxons treacherously stabbed the Britons, and three hundred of their nobles were thus slain. Gwrtheyrn was, however, spared, because he had married the daughter of Hengist ; but he was kept in bonds till he had surrendered " the three provinces of East, South, and Middle Sex, besides other districts at the option of his betrayers."

This surrender seems to have roused the resentment of the Britons to the highest pitch, and to have induced Germanus to go after the king and expel him from Dyfed.

The fire falling from heaven is a reduplication of the myth of the death of Benlli.

According to Nennius, the order of events was this :—

1. A Council in which Germanus met and denounced Gwrtheyrn, and from which Gwrtheyrn fled.
2. He retreats to Eryri, in Gwynedd, where he builds a caer, which eventually he surrenders to Ambrosius, or Emrys Wledig.
3. He then makes his headquarters in Guenessi, where he built himself a castle called Caer Gwrtheyrn.
4. A conclave of Saxons and Britons, at which the nobles of the latter are treacherously murdered. Gwrtheyrn is, however, spared.
5. Germanus again seeks him in Caer Gwrtheyrn ; fasts against him with all his clergy.
6. Gwrtheyrn again flies to a Castell (arx) Gwrtheyrn, " quae est in regione Demetorum juxta flumen Teibi." Germanus again fasts against him, and fire falls from heaven and consumes him and his wives.

We will take this succession and endeavour to find and determine the several sites.

1. Where the Council was held which deposed Gwrtheyrn we have no means of saying.

2. The castle in Eryri may be fixed with certainty. It is Dinas Emrys, on a rock above the road leading from Beddgelert to Llanberis, half-way between Beddgelert and Llyn y Ddinas. It is a remarkable rounded and very steep hill, ascended with comparative ease on one side only. The summit bears traces of having been fortified, and there is on it a large cairn now overgrown with brushwood, and there were in it till comparatively recently the remains of eight cytiau. The summit is very irregular. As Gwrtheyrn surrendered this fortress to Ambrosius, it bears the name of the latter. It occupies an important strategic position.

3. The next place of retreat was Caer Gwrtheyrn in Guenessi. There are various readings for Guenessi. In the Irish Nennius it is Guunis. Some thirteenth-century MSS. give "Guasmoric juxta Lugubaliam ibi ædificavit urbem quæ Anglice Palme castre dicitur." So far its situation has not been determined. Certain early forms of place-names occurring in the district between Morecambe Bay and the Solway Firth incline Mr. Egerton Phillimore to believe that it will ultimately be located there.

4. Nennius says that Germanus continued to preach to Gwrtheyrn to turn to God, and abandon his illicit connexion. Then he tells the story of the wars and death of Gwrthefyr, and then of the false peace concluded between Gwrtheyrn and Hengist, and of the massacre of the British nobles by the treacherous Saxons. Then he adds that Gwrtheyrn, who had been spared by Hengist because he had married the daughter of the Saxon leader, fled into Gwrtheyrnion to his castle, and that Germanus went after him. He had previously surrendered the "plaga occidentalis" to Ambrosius.

5. After this, Germanus, exasperated at the slaughter of three hundred British nobles, pursued Gwrtheyrn to his castle in Gwrtheyrnion, and took with him a number of British clerics. He ascended a rock and "fasted against him" for forty days and nights. Then the wretched king fled again.

6. Lastly, Gwrtheyrn took refuge in a castle (arx) that bore his name "in regione Demetiorum juxta flumen Teibi." The spot is Craig Gwrtheyrn, near Llandyssul, in Cardiganshire. It is an insulated, rounded hill, rising five hundred feet on the south bank of the river, half-way between Llandyssul and Llanfihangel-ar-Arth.

This was his last refuge. Germanus again pursued him, and fire fell from heaven and consumed him and his wives.

Nennius adds that the conclusion of the story was doubtful. What he related was from the Book of the blessed Germanus ; " alii autem aliter dixerunt." The other versions of the end of the king were, " that being hated by all the people of Britain for having received the Saxons, and being publicly charged by S. Germanus and the clergy in the sight of God, he betook himself to flight ; and that, deserted and a wanderer, he sought a place of refuge, till broken hearted he made an ignominious end. Some accounts state that the earth opened and swallowed him up on the night his castle was burned ; as no relics were discovered on the following morning, either of him, or of those who were burned with him."

A local tradition attaches to Gwrtheyrn's castle under Yr Eifl, in Lleyl, at the mouth of the romantic dingle Nant Gwrtheyrn. Here are earthworks, a circular embankment with a base-court forming a portion of a circle struck from another centre. The local legend is to the effect that an earthquake rent the rock on which it stands, and shook down the castle ; and in Nant Gwrtheyrn is shown a tumulus, popularly called Bedd Gwrtheyrn, under which the unfortunate king was held to be buried. More than a century ago it was dug into, and a stone coffin was exposed containing the bones of an unusually big man.

One of the Englynion y Beddau runs :—¹

The grave in Ystyfachau—
Everybody is doubtful about it.
It is the grave of Gwrtheyrn Gwrthenau.

The situation, however, of Ystyfachau is not known, it would appear.

Near Valle Crucis Abbey is the Pillar of Eliseg, which was set up by Cyngen ab Cadell (died 854), the last king of Powys of the old line, to the memory of his great-grandfather Eliseg or Elise. The inscription is now, unhappily, very illegible. Part of it has been read, " Pas-cen[tius] . . . filius Guarthi[girni] (quem) bened[ixit] Germanus." ² The words refer to some lost tradition, according to which Germanus had given his blessing to this son of the ignoble king ; but it establishes the existence of a Germanus in Wales at the period of Gwrtheyrn, or, at least, of his son.

Germanus, having accomplished his work in upsetting Benlli and Gwrtheyrn from their thrones, and blessing the usurpations of Cadell and Ambrosius, and having, if we may place any reliance at all on the statements in the Iolo MSS., done something towards the establishment of colleges in South Wales, departed for Ireland, and was appointed by his kinsman, Patrick, to be the first Bishop of Man.

¹ Black Book of Carmarthen, ed. Dr. J. G. Evans, p. 67.

² See especially Prof. Sayce's restored reading of the inscription, Arch. Camb., 1909, pp. 45-6 ; also Sir J. Rhys in Y Cymmrodor, xxi (1908).

The date cannot be determined with precision, but it was somewhere between 464 and 466.

Joscelyn, the author of the sixth Life of S. Patrick in Colgan's Collection, says: "Quemdam discipulorum S. Patricii visum sanctum et sapientem Germanum nominatum, in episcopum promotum, illius gentis ecclesiæ novellæ regentem præposuit, et in quodam promontorio (quod adhuc insula Patricii vocatum, eo quod ipso ibidem aliquantum demorabatur) episcopalem sedem posuit."¹

In the same Life is given an account of the conversion of Maccaill, a robber, who was destined to become fourth Bishop of Man, after Connidrius and Romulus, who succeeded Germanus.² S. Patrick is said himself to have laboured in the Isle of Man.³

That Germanus summoned his disciple Brioc to his assistance is possible enough, though he has left no foundation in Man; but Brioc received a cult in churches in Kirkcudbright and Rothesay.

It is possible enough that the statement that S. Patrick worked in the Isle of Man may be due to a mistake, and that the Patrick who went there was the son of Sannan the Deacon, the pupil of Germanus.

The death of Germanus took place in 474.⁴

His church near Peel Castle in Man is called Kirk-Jarman.

When we come to consider the dates of his life we encounter great difficulties.

The statement that he founded Llantwit and placed Illtyd there cannot be accepted, and it is one of a very late date. Illtyd can hardly have been converted till 472, and could not well have founded Llantwit before 480.

The statement relative to Catwg is also impossible chronologically, as Catwg died about 577, a century after the death of Germanus. Dyfrig also belonged to a later generation.

It is unfortunately impossible to fix the date of the revolution under

¹ Trias Thaum., Vita 6^{ta}, p. 98.

² Vita S. Patricii in Acta SS. Boll., Mart. T. I., pp. 570-1; Trias Thaum., Vita 6^{ta}, p. 98.

³ Acta SS. Boll., Mart. T. I., p. 559.

⁴ Ussher in his Primordii gives this date. He almost certainly had authority for it, which we no longer possess. He was not the man to give it as a bit of guesswork. The date of the death of Germanus is not in the Chron. Scottorum, nor in the Annals of Ulster or Inisfallen. Those of Tighernach are lost between 360 and 489. O'Conor, Revum Hibern. Scriptores, ii, p. 114, has: "A.D. 471, Germano primo Mannias episcopo defuncto duo successores a S. Patricio ordinati sunt, Conindrus et Romulus, quibus postea successit Maccaldus."

GERMANUS FOUNDATIONS.

Ambrosius Aurelianus that led to the expulsion of Gwrtheyrn from his command.

Approximately, but only approximately, these would be the dates of the life of Germanus.

Germanus conjecturally born in Armorica	c. 410
„ went to Ireland to S. Patrick	c. 440
„ leaves Ireland and takes charge of Brioc, Illyd and Patrick mac Sannan	c. 450
„ leaves Gaul to meet S. Patrick in Britain	c. 462
„ engaged in contest with Gwrtheyrn	c. 462-4
„ returns to Ireland and appointed first Bishop of Man	c. 466
„ dies in Man	c. 474

The dedications to him in North Wales lie mainly in the district where he had his contests with Benlli and Gwrtheyrn. Cadell doubtless rewarded him with lands for his aid, as would also Ambrosius Aurelianus from those of Gwrtheyrn.

His churches are Llanarmon and Bettws Garmon, in Carnarvonshire; Llanarmon yn Ial, Llanarmon Dyffryn Ceiriog, Llanarmon Mynydd Mawr (called also Llanarmon Fach), and Capel Garmon, in Denbighshire; Llanfechain (formerly Llanarmon ym Mechain) and Castle Caereinion, in Montgomeryshire; and Llanarmon or S. Harmon's, in Gwrtheyrnion, Radnorshire. All these, with the exception of the last-named, are in North Wales. It is possible enough that some of them may be dedicated to his great namesake of Auxerre, as all of them subsequently came to be so regarded.

Under Llanarmon yn Ial there is included in the Valor of 1535 the item, "In oblacionibus coram Imagine S'ci Garmon'—xxx^s." ¹ With this the notice of Leland, some five years later, well coincides, that "Greate Pilgremage and Offering was a (of) late to S. Armon." ² In the south wall of the church, outside, is inserted in an upright position the effigy of a priest in Eucharistic vestments, ³ which Pennant says has done duty for S. Garmon; but his image was, no doubt, destroyed like all others at the Reformation. On the summit of a rocky knoll, near Tomen y Rhodwydd, in this parish, is his Holy Well, Ffynnon Armon, the water of which is said neither to increase nor diminish at any time, nor has it any visible inlet or outlet. It was formerly much frequented.

¹ iv, p. 446; cf. vi, p. xlv.

² Itin., v, fo. 35. Lewis Glyn Cothi (fifteenth century) swears by his hand, "Myn llaw hên Armon!" (Works, 1837, p. 76).

³ There is an illustration of it in Lloyd-Williams and Underwood, Village Churches of Denbighshire, 1872.

In Llanfechain churchyard, on the north side of the church, is a small mound called Twmpath Garmon, from which he is said to have preached, and similar mounds exist at Llanarmon Dyffryn Ceiriog and Castle Caereinion. The water for baptisms at Llanfechain continued to be carried, until within last century, from the Ffynnon Armon there, about 200 yards from the church. There are Holy Wells of his also at Capel Garmon and Bettws Garmon, which were formerly in great repute. Garth Garmon is the name of a township of Capel Garmon, and Clás Garmon of one of S. Harmon's. The clás (cf. Irish clais) of the latter clearly points to the existence of some kind of monastic community at an early period.

Jonathan Williams in his History of Radnorshire,¹ says that "there is on the bank of the River Marteg, at the eastern extremity of the parish, near to the confines of the parish of Llanbister, a remarkable and conspicuous tumulus, named Bedd Garmon, i.e. the Grave of Garmon;" and further, at p. 89 of the same work, he says: "One of the townships or parishes" constituting the manor of Rhayader is called Tu Sant Harmon. Tu is simply an illiterate way of spelling Ty, the House of S. Garmon (cf. Ty Ddewi for S. David's).

In Flintshire, in the parish of Mold, is Maes Garmon,² supposed to have been the place where the Alleluiaic Victory was won by Germanus of Auxerre against the Picts and Saxons. It is very doubtful that the overthrow took place there, and that Germanus of Auxerre was in Wales at all. It may take its name from Germanus of Armorica. In 1736 an obelisk was erected on the spot as the traditional site of the victory, first located here by Usher.

In Devon the parish church of Week S. Germans has the saint, probably, as patron, but the patronal feast is observed on July 31.

In Cornwall is S. German's on the Lynher, an early monastic and episcopal centre from Saxon times certainly. We may suspect that this was actually one of the mission colleges founded by Germanus mac Restitutus, rather than those in South Wales.

The parish church of Rame is dedicated to S. German; so also was a chapel at Padstow (B. Stafford's Register, 1415).

In Lower Brittany are Clohars Carnoet by Quimperlé, and Riec

¹ Tenby, 1859, p. 239. There was a tradition that he had his hermitage adjoining the churchyard of S. Harmon's. Bp. Maddox (1736-43) in MS. Z in the Episcopal Library at S. Asaph records under Llanarmon Dyffryn Ceiriog that Garmon is "said to have been buried under a plain stone in the Church."

² Maes, a field, sometimes means a field of battle, but it is most unusual to find the word prefixed to the name of a Saint. If Maes Garmon were the scene, the Saxons must have sailed round to the west, as they can hardly have fought their way across the island.

STATUE OF S. GERMANUS.

At Pleyben.

near by ; Plougastel-Saint-Germain, west of Quimper, and Kerlaz. Also Pleyben by Châteaulin, Laz by Châteauneuf and Plougonven near Morlaix. All these are in Finistère. No trace of the Saint is to be found in the diocese of Vannes. The dedications to S. Germain we meet with in Ille-et-Vilain belong to a different Saint, German mac Guill.

Germanus, Bishop of Man, has met with a hard fate, and no recognition. He has everywhere been supplanted by his noted namesake of Auxerre.

M. Loth, in Annales de Bretagne, 1905, has disputed the thesis that there was an Armorican Germanus distinct from the saint of Auxerre. We quite admit that the authority of the Iolo MSS. is of little value, and that the Irish traditions relative to the family of S. Patrick are not of much higher. But we venture to think that it is possible to conciliate, by the assumption we make, the Welsh and Irish traditions with Nennius and the Life of S. Brioc.

Germanus does not occur in the Irish Martyrologies. In the Isle of Man he was commemorated on July 3. In the Welsh Calendars the Festival of Germanus, Gwyl Armon, occurs in May, July, and October. The days in the two last months are festivals of his namesake of Auxerre, and that in May of him of Paris. May 27 and 28 occur in some half a dozen Welsh Calendars ; July 13 and 14 in five ; July 31 in a score or more Calendars (including those of the earlier editions of the Welsh Bible and Prayer-Book) ; and in some fourteen on October 1. July 31 is often marked " Gwyl Armon yn Ial " in the calendars, but in more recent times the wakes were held in Yale on August 1. The wakes at Llanfechain and Castle Caereinion were held on October 1, latterly the Sunday after October 12. In the two Carnarvonshire parishes they followed July 31.

At S. Harmon's, Radnorshire, the feast was kept on the Sunday after August 13.

At S. German's in Cornwall on July 31, transferred to August 1, but also a fair on May 28, the day of S. Germanus, Bishop of Paris.

At Plougastel-Saint-Germain the patronal feast is held on the first Sunday in July, and the Pardon on the first Sunday after Easter.

At Pleyben the Pardon is on the first Sunday in August. At Riec the patronal feast is on the first Monday in July. At Clohars Carnoet on August 15.

There is a fine statue of S. Germanus at Pleyben.

S. GERMANUS MAC GUILL, Bishop, Confessor

MENTION has been made in the Life of S. Ailbe of that saint having come across the Sons of Goll on the Rance, near Dol.

And under the head of Achebran some account has been given of the party of Irish bishops and their sisters who came to Cornwall, and after a brief sojourn there went on to Gaul, landed at the mouth of the Rance, and founded churches up the river and in the surrounding country; as also of their appearing at Rheims in 509.

It is not necessary here to repeat what was said under S. ACHEBRAN. The words in the Life of S. Ailbe are, "In illa autem regione magnum edificavit monasterium, in quo reliquit filios Guill."¹

The party on reaching Cornwall formed small settlements. That of German is now Germoe under S. Breaca. The name is Germocus in Leland and William of Worcester, and Leland, quoting from the legend of S. Breaca, says that he was a king. As such he is represented in a fifteenth-century fresco in the church of S. Breage, and in a statue in a niche above the porch at Germoe.

There is a story in the Life of S. Ciaran of Saighir about a German, an old travelling companion.

German went to visit the master, whereupon Ciaran proposed after prayer to perform one of his penances, to go into a tub of cold water, and he invited German to come in with him. This German did—but the water was so cold that his teeth chattered, and he was about to scramble out, when Ciaran assured him that if he would only remain in and bear it a little longer, he would get over the sense of the intense cold. German did so.

Presently Ciaran exclaimed, "Heigh! a fish! a fish!" and between them the two nude Saints succeeded in capturing a trout that was in the vat. "I rejoice that we have got the fish," said Ciaran, "for I am expecting home to-day my old pupil Carthagh, whom I had to send abroad, as he was rather disorderly as a disciple—and he will want his dinner."

It is not certain that this was the same German, but chronologically it may well be so. Though Germoe or German may have been of royal descent, he was hardly a king.

In the Irish Martyrologies of Tallaght, O'Gorman, and Donegal, German mac Guill is commemorated on July 30. William of Worcester says that the day on which Germoc was commemorated in Cornwall was June 24, and he calls him a bishop. Germoe Feast, however, is on the first Thursday in May.

¹ Acta SS. Hib. in Cod. Sal., col. 244.

1200
209

S. GERMOE.

From Fresco in S. Breage (restored).

A chain of his churches is found in Ille-et-Vilaine: S. Gormain sur Ille, S. Germain en Conglès, and S. Germain des Pinel, also the very interesting and fine church of the same dedication in Rennes.

In the churchyard of Germoe is a singular structure, that is called S. Germoe's Chair. It existed in the time of Leland. There was a Holy Well near the church, but no structure of that nature remains.

At Trédias near Broons, Côtes-du-Nord, were seven crosses, marking the spot where traditionally the seven Irish brother pilgrims separated. A new road has been carried over the spot, and has buried the crosses. They were situated on the Farm of S. Georges.¹

S. GERMOE, see S. GERMANUS MAC GUILL

S. GERWYN, see S. BERWYN

S. GILDAS, Abbot, Confessor

THE authorities for the Life of Gildas are, first, his own statement about himself in the book of De Excidio Britannia.

Next, a Life by a monk of Rhuis, written in the ninth century. An admirable critical edition of this Life by Professor Hugh Williams has appeared in his Gildas, Cymmrodorion Record Series, 1901, pp. 317-389. This Life was first printed in 1605 by John à Bosco, in his Bibliotheca Floriacensis, from an imperfect MS., and this was reprinted by the Bollandists in Acta SS., Jun. II, pp. 958-67; also by Colgan in his Acta SS. Hibernia, 1645, p. 181 et seq.

In a complete form it was published by Mabillon for the first time, Acta SS. O.S.B., sæc. I, 1668, pp. 138-52; and now by Professor Williams in his Gildas.

This Life was written during the lifetime apparently of Isembard, Bishop of Poitiers (Isembardus 1047-1086). But that it is based on much earlier material is unquestionable. The monks of Rhuis were able to fly before the Normans and carry off the body of Gildas and their chief treasures to Berry, and doubtless conveyed their books with them.

Professor Williams thinks that it was written originally in or about

¹ De Lhommeau, "Visite aux tombeaux de Trésneur," in L'Union Libérale de Dinan, June 4, 1903. Ajoutons que la route qui passe près de la ferme et traverse le ruisseau est neuve, et qu'elle a enseveli sous son remblai les Sept Croix, groupe pieux dressé par les fidèles en l'honneur des sept saints de Bretagne lesquels étaient Gébrien, Hélien, Pétran, Germain, Véran, Abran et Tressaint.

880, and we suppose that the chapters, 32-45, have been added at a later date. This is possible, but not certain. In chapter 32 there is a reference back to what had already been said, "Britannia, quæ olim Letavia dicta fuit, sicut diximus;" the reference being to c. 16, "Dei jussu pervenisset in Armoricam quondam Galliæ regionem, tunc autem a Britannis, a quibus possidebatur, Letavia dicebatur."

On the whole we should consider the Life by the Monk of Rhuis as a composition of the end of the eleventh century, based upon earlier material.

Another edition by Mommsen, in Monumenta German., Hist. Chron. Minora, iii. (1894), pp. 91-106.

The third source is a Life attributed to Caradog of Llancarfan. Archbishop Ussher possessed a MS. of this Life, in which it was so attributed in a rude distich appended to it.

Caradog was a friend of Geoffrey of Monmouth, and accordingly belonged to the middle of the twelfth century. The manner in which Glastonbury is forced into prominence in the narrative leads rather to the conviction that it was a composition of a monk of that place.

This Life was first printed by Stevenson for the "English Historical Society" in 1838, then by Giles for the "Caxton Society" in 1854. It has been published by Mommsen in the above-mentioned Collection, pp. 107-10. Also by Professor Williams in his Gildas, pp. 394-413.

This served as basis for the Life of Gildas in Capgrave's Nova Legenda Angliæ.

On the other hand, the Life by the monk of Rhuis has served the same purpose to a condenser whose work is in the Bibl. Nat. Paris, and which is given by De Smedt in his Catalogus hagiograph. Latin. Bibl. Paris.

From what has been said under S. ANEURIN,¹ it will be seen that the Welsh genealogists identify Gildas with him; but that the Aneurin, who is also Gildas, was not the author of the Gododin.

For the authorities for his pedigree we refer back to that article.

Before proceeding to the narrative of the Life of Gildas, it will be requisite first of all to consider at some length the date of his birth.

I. ON THE DATE OF THE BIRTH OF GILDAS.

In order to arrive at an approximate chronology of the Life of Gildas, it is necessary, as a preliminary, to determine the date of the Battle of Mount Badon, upon which the whole calculation depends.

Gildas says: "From that time (i.e. from the victory won by Ambrosius Aurelianus), the citizens were sometimes victorious, sometimes the enemy. . . . This continued up to the year of the siege of Mount Badon, and of almost the last great slaughter inflicted upon the rascally crew. And this commences, a fact I know, as the forty-fourth year, with one month now elapsed ; it is also the year of my birth " (usque ad annum obsessionis Badonici montis, novissimæque ferme de furciferis non minimæ stragis, quique quadragesimus quartus, ut novi, orditur annus, mense jam uno emenso, qui et meæ nativitatis est). He proceeds to say that from that date comparative peace had reigned. " But not even at the present day are the cities of our country inhabited as formerly ; deserted and dismantled, they lie neglected until now (hactenus squalent), because, although wars with foreigners have ceased, domestic wars continue. The recollection of so hopeless a ruin of the island, and of the unlooked-for help, has been fixed in the memory of those who have survived as witnesses of both marvels. Owing to this (deliverance) kings, magistrates, private persons, priests, ecclesiastics, severally preserved their own rank. As they died away, when an age had succeeded ignorant of that storm, and having experience only of the present quiet, all the controlling influences of truth and justice were so shaken and overturned that . . . not even the remembrance of them is to be found among the afore-named ranks." ¹ From this passage we learn that the Battle of Mount Badon arrested the advance of the Teutonic invaders, and was succeeded by a period of at least thirty-three years, a generation, of tranquility. Nennius makes the Battle of Mount Badon to have been the twelfth of Arthur's victories. " In this engagement nine hundred and sixty fell by his hand alone, no one but the Lord affording him assistance." ² The " by his hand alone " is, of course, a bit of mythical extravagance. The Annales Cambriæ have : " Bellum Badonis in quo Arthur portavit crucem Domini nostri Ihu Xp'i tribus diebus et tribus noctibus in humeros suos et Brittones victores fuerunt." ³

¹ i, pp. 158-60.

In the Irish Nennius, although it is stated that Arthur and the Britons fought twelve great battles, yet the name of the twelfth has slipped out.

Henry of Huntingdon says that in this battle " four hundred and forty of the Britons fell by the swords of their enemies in a single day, none of their host acting in concert, and Arthur alone receiving succour from the Lord." ⁴

¹ De Excidio Britannia, ed. Prof. H. Williams, pp. 60-3.

² Hist. Brit., ed. Mommsen, p. 200.

³ In Y Cymmrodor ix, (1888), p. 154, ed. Phillimore.

⁴ Hist. Angl., ii, c. 18. Geoffrey of Monmouth makes the Saxons besiege Bath. Arthur, who was in the north, hastens south and attacks the Saxons, who are on a mountain, and slays 470 with his own hands. Hist. Reg. Brit., ix, c. 4.

Cessation of Hostili-
ties. Now, in order to determine the date of this victory, we have to fix our eyes on the arrest in the onward march of the West Saxons, giving peace for over thirty years. That Gildas was mainly concerned with the condition of Britain in the south-west is probable. He was much in South Wales, and, if the Vita 2^{da} may be trusted, was for a while at Glastonbury.

It was during the long pause of a generation, during which the invaders made no attempt to press forward, that Gildas wrote, and it was towards the end of that rest, before hostilities had broken out anew and fresh districts had been overrun, plundered, and devastated.

Now we can hardly expect to find a notice of this crushing defeat set down in the Saxon Chronicle; that records no reverses of the arms of the invaders, only their successes. What we shall have to look for, then, is the sudden halt in the onward sweep, lasting many years.

We do not obtain any help from Bede, who simply paraphrases the words of Gildas, whilst misunderstanding his calculation. He says: "They (the Britons) had at this time for their leader Ambrosius Aurelius, a modest man, who alone, by chance, of the Roman nation had survived the storm, in which his parents, who were of the royal race, had perished. Under him the Britons revived, and offering battle to the victors, by the help of God, came off victorious. From that day, sometimes the natives and sometimes their enemies, prevailed, till the year of the siege of Badon Hill, when they made no small slaughter of those invaders, about forty-four years after their arrival in England. But of this hereafter."¹

According to Bede, then, 493 was the date of the battle, but he fixes this date entirely on a misapprehension of the words of Gildas. "Concerning this" we will speak, as does Bede, "hereafter."

Invasion
of Hampshire. We will now look at the entries in the Chronicle, and see what we shall be able to gather thence for fixing the period of the thirty-three years' arrest in the invasion; and if this be fixed, then we shall be able to determine the date of the siege of Mount Badon, which was that from which the pause in the conquest of Britain began. In 495 Cerdic and Cynric arrived with five ships at Cerdic's Ore, and the same day fought against the Brits. Cerdic's Ore is probably Calshot, at the mouth of Southampton Water.²

In 501 Port and his two sons came to Britain with two ships, and effected a landing at Portsmouth ; and in a conflict slew a young British chieftain.

¹ Hist. Eccl., i, c. 16.

² Ore is a term still in use on the coast of Hampshire, and signifies a spit running into the sea. A farm by Calshot is called Ower, which is the same as Ore, and Camden says that Calshot is a corruption of Caldshore. Britannia, 1594, p. 190.

In 508 Cerdic and Cynric were engaged in a battle with the Brits at Natan-leagh, slew a British king, and five thousand men with him. Natan-leagh is Netley, and the district as far as Charford was then included in the Natan-leagh settlement.

In 514 the West Saxons arrived with three ships and landed at Cerdic's Ore ; and Stuf and Whitgar, nephews of Cerdic, fought the Brits and put them to flight.

" In 519 Cerdic and Cynric undertook the government of the West Sexe, and the same year they fought with the Brits at Cerdic's ford (Charford) ; and from that time forth the kingly family of the West Sexe have reigned." ¹

The West Sexe were now compacted into one political organization. No entries were made for 520-526 ; but in 527 we have, " In this year Cerdic and Cynric fought against the Brits at the place called Cerdic's-lea."

In 530 Cerdic and Cynric took possession of the Isle of Wight ; but not till 552, thirty-three years after that Cerdic became King of the West Saxons, was there any move westwards.

Geography of South Hampshire and East Dorset. To understand the situation, it is necessary to take a survey of the southern portion of Hampshire, bounded on the north by Wiltshire and on the west by Dorsetshire.

A great half-moon of chalk hills extends from just above Havant in the east to Badbury Rings by Shapwick in the west, about four miles north of Wimbourne. The basin between these hills and the sea at Havant was occupied by the forest of Bere.

At Portchester on Portsmouth harbour was the Roman station and town of Portus Magnus, from which a Roman road ran to Bitterne opposite Southampton, where was the town of Clausentum.

Here the River Itchen enters the sea, having broken a way through the chalk ring ; at Redbridge the Anton or Teste also flows into the sea by Southampton, and the whole tract between the rivers from Eastleigh to Romsey was originally one vast morass, out of which rose tofts covered with trees.

From Southampton Water to Wimbourne and the Stour was one immense region of forest, heath and marsh, so impenetrable that a traveller from Clausentum to Morionio or Poole would probably go round to Venta Belgarum (Winchester), hence to Old Sarum, and then take the road south, afterwards called the Ackling Way.

¹ Saxon Chronicle, sub. ann.

Now within the area enclosed by the great chalk half-moon is a lesser crescent, rising from 400 to 500 feet above the sea, also of chalk down, with its concavity towards Southampton. Beyond this is the basin of the Avon, flowing from Salisbury. The river formerly wandered among marshes, now drained, but periodically flooded, affording superior dairy farm land. At Charford a stretch of chalk hills from the east approaches the river, and contracts the area of morass.

The Jutes and Saxons having made themselves masters of Natan-leagh or Netley, the district between the mouth of the Itchen and Portsmouth harbour, and having pillaged Portus Magnus and Clausentum, remained in occupation of this district for twenty-four years, and then made a further advance. They passed over the inner crescent of down, crossed the Avon at Charford, and there fought the Britons and defeated them, and most probably took possession of the strong entrenched camp of Whitsbury that commanded the ford, and spread over the whole of the region enclosed by the hoop of chalk downs from the vale of the Avon to that of the Stour by Wimbourne.

A spur of chalk ridge strikes inward from the west, rising to 600 feet, and forms the Pentridge. South of this, from the Avon to the Stour, towards the sea, all was sandy barren waste and morass. West of Pentridge, in a hollow, a chalk valley unwatered by a stream, was Cranbourne Forest stretching its arms along the slopes of the hills and occupying all the land that was not fen, but having the bare down swelling above it; and that bare down was densely peopled by the Romano-Britons, who lived there mainly on their flocks, and who have literally strewn these downs with the remains of their dwellings clustered in villages and towns. Across these downs, straight as an arrow, and perfectly distinguishable to the present day, is the Ackling Street, coming from Old Sarum and striking for Badbury Rings, a junction point of several roads.

This elevated chalk region was a Gwent. The forests that occupied the lowlands, the river basins—where the water spread, shifted its course, and formed deep morasses and lagoons—as also the heathery tracts strewn with swamps, were hardly inhabited at all, but population teemed on the downs. The researches of General Pitt Rivers have shown both how numerous they were, and also what was their condition of life before the Saxons swept them away. They had absorbed a considerable amount of Roman culture. Their wattle and mud houses were admirably drained, and were heated by rude hypocausts. They made use of Roman coins, Samian ware of the finest quality, and pottery with green and yellow glaze, which was of extreme rarity among the Romans. "They had chests of drawers in which they kept their goods, which were decorated with bronze bosses, and ornamented with tastefully designed handles of the same metal. They had vessels of glass, which implies a certain degree of luxury. They used tweezers for extracting thorns, bronze ear-picks, and even implements designed for cleaning the finger nails, and they played games of draughts; a number of iron styli showed that they were able to read and write. . . . Some of their houses were painted on the inside, and warmed with flues in the Roman style. They were, perhaps, covered with Roman tegulæ and imbrices, and others were certainly roofed with tiles of Purbecke shale. They wore well-formed bronze finger rings, set with stones or enamelled. They used bangles of bronze and Kimmeridge shale, and one brooch discovered was of the finest mosaic, such as could not easily be surpassed even in Italy at the present day. Also gilt and enamelled brooches, some of which were in the form of animals. They used bronze and white metal spoons; and the number of highly ornate bronze and white metal fibulæ showed that such tastefully decorated fastenings for their dresses must have been in common use." ¹ They had their amphitheatres for public entertainments; they drew water from wells, sunk in one instance to the depth of 188 feet. Of images of the gods, of indications of paganism, these villages were barren, but there was no evidence that Christianity had taken hold of the occupants; indeed, the slovenly and irreverent manner in which they buried their dead in refuse heaps and ashpits shows that they had lost all sense of veneration for the departed, such as was so marked a feature in the people in the bronze age, and had not acquired any idea of the dignity of the human body such as comes in with Christianity. The Ackling Street runs straight as an arrow from Old Sarum to a point now called East Woodyates, and there makes a slight bend to the east; and from this point drives directly, without a swerve, to Badbury Rings, that can be seen distinctly in the distance, with the road aiming at them. Here, in the opinion of General Pitt Rivers, stood the Romano-British town of Vindogladia, a centre and market to the numerous villages strewn on all the downs around. Here he unearthed a portion of a town. The exploration was never completed, and all that can be said is that here stood a considerable village or small town, inhabited by Romanized Britons, at the same time as the villages on the surrounding Gwent. Roman coins were discovered down to Honorius, 395-423, who withdrew the legions from Britain.

MAP OF BOKERLY AND GRIM'S DYKES.

¹ Excavations in Bokerly and Wansdyke, privately printed, 1892, iii, pp. 5-6.

+ How advanced! Agnostics.

From Woodyates the Ackling Street runs over open down, rising some 340 to 390 feet above the sea. This down declines towards the west, where a broad waterless valley, once occupied by Cranborne Chase, separates it from the higher ridge, now tree-covered but formerly bare, that is a continuation of the half-moon of chalk hills enclosing the basins of the Itchen, Anton, and Avon.

This description has been necessary to explain what follows.

The Gewissæ, having crossed the Avon at Charford, made themselves masters of the Gwent that culminates in Pentridge, and of the worthless morass south of it ; and they doubtless then sacked Vindogladia, if Woodyates may be regarded as occupying the site of that town.

They were, however, in a bad strategical position, for the ring of high land that half encircled them was strongly defended by a chain of fortresses of prehistoric origin, but capable as ever of being utilized, all within sight of one another : Badbury, Bugbury, Hod Hill, Hambledon, Melbury, Winklebury, Castle Ditches, Chiselbury, and Clearbury Ring. And up the Avon stood the most redoubtable fortress in Southern Britain, Sorbiodunum (Old Sarum).

One great advantage they had, however, obtained—a hold on the Ackling Street.

Here, then, pent up in this half-hoop, if we may trust the Saxon Chronicle, the Gewissæ remained inactive, save for the subjugation of the Isle of Wight, for thirty-three years, making no attempt to break out to the north or to the west.

The Britons on the Isle of Wight now found themselves cut off from their countrymen by the Gewissæ, who occupied the mainland from Portsmouth to the River Avon, that enters the sea at Christ Church. We may be sure that they would not relish this isolation, and would escape with all their goods to that portion of the country still unoccupied by the invaders ; and when we are informed that in 530 Cerdic and Cynric conquered the Isle of Wight, and slew many men at Wihtgaras-byrg (Carisbrooke), we may feel confident that the island had already been to a large extent abandoned, and that the slaying was simply a massacre of such as remained.

Now it is certainly a remarkable fact that Cerdic and Cynric, who had landed in 495, and had been joined by fresh adventurers in 501 and 514, should have done nothing to push forward their conquest from 519 to 552, when the Battle of Old Sarum was fought, followed by Barbury Hill in 556, marking an outburst of fresh activity.

They did, indeed, consolidate their power in south Hampshire and

Period of Inactivity for thirty-three years.

east Dorset by the Battle of Cerdic's Lea, the site of which has not been determined, and by the conquest and occupation of the Isle of Wight; but they made no attempt to break through the chain of forts that lay along the heights of the chalk hills to north and west, so far as we can ascertain from the entries in the Saxon Chronicle.

How are we to account for this inactivity for thirty-three years?

This has been explained by the great reverse of Mount Badbury. Badon, which Roger of Wendover states was fought in 520. Roger is a very worthless authority on the early history of Britain, but on this point he may possibly enough be right.

Henry of Huntingdon, a grave and trustworthy historian, mentions the battle, and he sets it down as taking place after 519, and before 530. It is true that he quotes Nennius, whom he calls Gildas, but he must have had some grounds for placing the battle just after 519. The *Annales Cambriæ*¹ give the date of Mount Badon as 516, but the dates in the early portion of this work are not more than approximate.

Now Gildas says that after this battle ensued a lull in the invasion lasting for a generation. There was such a lull, according to the Saxon Chronicle, from 519 to 552, just thirty-three years, a generation, and at no other time in the latter part of the fifth or in the sixth century. We may ask, if the Battle of Mount Badon was productive of this arrest, whether it is not probable that its site would be somewhere on the then frontier of the Gewissæ. And we have Badbury Hill that answers our requirements. Badbury is the southernmost point of the sweep of hill and fortresses. It rises some four miles north-west of Wimbourne to a height of 327 feet, and is a sufficiently conspicuous object to give its name to a hundred. It is an entrenched hill, and the camp measures 1,800 feet long by 1,700 feet wide. There are three concentric banks and ditches; it is the point of junction of the Roman roads from Old Sarum to Dorchester from Morionio, one leading to the junction of the Fosse Road and that from Old Sarum to Ad Axium.

It is conceivable that the Gewissæ, unable to force their way to Old Sarum past Clearbury, and fearing to leave their base exposed to a swoop down from Badbury on their settlements in south Hampshire, may have resolved on turning the flank of the Britons by taking Badbury, which was the key to the position, and which opened up to them Dorchester, Ilchester, and the way to the Severn basin.

That district from the Chilterns to the Severn was the most prosperous and richest in Britain, and may well have incited in them the lust of conquest and of plunder.

¹ Y Cymmrodor, ix (1888), p. 154.

Swant = plain country is a part of the own English word of forest 5 from

But two ways only were open to them, that by Old Sarum to Ad Axium, and that by Badbury and Dorchester.

From Old Sarum they shrank. "Celt and Roman alike had seen the military value of the height from which the eye sweeps nowadays over the grassy meadows of the Avon to the arrowy spire of Salisbury ; and, admirable as the position was in itself, it had been strengthened at a vast cost of labour. The camp on the summit of the knoll was girt in by a trench hewn so deeply in the chalk that, from the inner side of it, the white face of the rampart rose a hundred feet high, while strong outworks protected the approaches to the fortress from the west and from the east. Arms must have been useless against such a stronghold as this." ¹

Nor was Old Sarum alone ; less than three miles east of it was another very strong fortress, Figsbury, and Clearbury would have to be passed before Old Sarum was reached.

Of the two doorways to the west, that by Badbury was certainly the easiest to force ; and it had this great advantage, that it could be attacked without exposing the base itself, defended by impassable morasses.

No modern invader would hesitate for a moment as to which to choose. If, then, Mount Badon be Badbury, all seems clear. The West Saxons made a desperate attack on it in 520, and met with a crushing defeat which left them inactive for a generation, save only that they reduced the Isle of Wight. There is further evidence that for a long period they remained on the defensive only.

Bokerly Dyke. A very remarkable range of embankment and moat extends from Bousbury or Martin Wood, between Cranborne and South Damerham, and stretching north-west over Blagden Hill descends to Martin Down, and reaches the Ackling Street precisely at Woodyates, where that road makes its one and only deflection. It crosses the Roman Road, then curves south, and passing West Woodyates disappears in the direction of Garston Wood in tilled land.

No further traces of it can be found till we come suddenly on it again above Gussage S. Andrew, on Thorney Down, where the modern road from Salisbury to Blandford cuts through it. Thence it can be traced for four miles, with breaks, to Launceston or Langstone Down, in Tarrant Monkton parish.

Now these formidable entrenchments were obviously thrown up by a people occupying the Pentridge Gwent. The date at which thrown up can also be approximately determined, at least for that portion which crosses the Roman Road at Woodyates.

¹ Green, The Making of England, 1897, i, p. 105.

JK'

“Bokerly Dyke, the present boundary line between Dorset and Wilts, is an entrenchment in high relief, nearly four miles long, running in a north-west and south-east direction across the old Roman road which runs from Sarum to Badbury. It has a ditch on the north-east side of the rampart,¹ proving that it was from this point the enemy was expected . . . it everywhere occupied strong ground, if viewed from the standpoint of an enemy advancing to attack it from the north-east. It runs somewhat crookedly along the ground . . . this crookedness arose from the constructors availing themselves of hollows as they secured the ground. It ran across the Gwent, or open downland, between the two great forests which existed at that time, and the remains of which still, or until quite lately, did exist on both flanks. On the south-east the Dyke terminated upon strong ground in Martin Wood, which may be considered as the survival of the Forest of Holt, and to have been formerly continuous with the New Forest. On the left it terminated in a part of the country which, within the memory of persons still living, was a part of Cranborne Chase Wood.”²

The Dyke, wherever it fails to be distinguishable, has either been ploughed down or else it stopped at a forest. And a forest in those early days, a tangle of briar and thorns and undergrowth, was eminently effective as a point on which to abut. It re-appears again where there was open down.

General Pitt Rivers says further: “Bokerly entrenchment, dating beyond doubt as late as the departure of the Romans from Britain, cannot have been erected earlier than the year 520.”

It would appear to have been thrown up by men flush with the pillage of Romano-British towns, to such an extent are the banks peppered throughout with relics of that period and late Roman coins. That the Teutonic invaders did throw up dykes against the Britons is certain; Offa's Dyke is evidence to that effect.

One thing seems very evident. Those who threw up Bokerly Dyke—and in so doing they buried a portion of the Romano-British town at Woodyates, and heaped the bank with the débris of the houses—were afraid of attack from the north and north-east, and took special care to guard against an enemy advancing along Ackling Street; for here, where the Dyke crosses the Roman road, they threw up a double line of defences. The inner bank has been ploughed down, and the inner moat filled; but they were both revealed by the explorations of General Pitt Rivers.

¹ General Pitt Rivers is here speaking of that portion of the Ditches which he explored.

² Excavations in Bokerly and Wansdyke, privately printed, 1892, p. 9.

The dense forest of Cranborne, filling the dry valley from Wood-yates, Upwood, Handley, perhaps rendered a dyke there unnecessary; perhaps the defence was continued by an abatis of trees. Above Gussage S. Andrews a double bank and two moats re-appear crossing elevated down, and only ceasing where there is a valley formerly dense with trees and brambles. They re-appear again on the Down by Tarrant Hinton. Beyond, further south, they cannot be traced, for here the Gwent comes to an end, and the defence, if continued, was continued by an abatis. It will be seen by the map that the frontier here was thrust considerably forward, somewhat north-west of Badbury. For what reason we are unable to say.

Whether the Saxons by a daring rush had gained Badbury and were dislodged by the Britons and driven back, or whether they attacked Badbury and were repulsed, does not appear from the meagre notices we have of the Battle of Mount Badon—assuming that Badbury is Mount Badon.

Gildas merely mentions the "obsession" of Mount Badon, without stating by whom it was besieged. Nennius is not more explicit. Geoffrey of Monmouth, who connects Mount Badon with a hill near Bath, makes Arthur and the Britons attack it, and drive the Saxons from it; and though the authority of Geoffrey is naught, we suspect that what really took place was something of this sort. The Gewissæ made a dash for Badbury and seized it. They could not, however, cross the Stour, the ford commanded by Spettisbury, nor move north, threatened by Hod Hill and Hambleton; and Arthur with his Britons succeeded in driving back the Saxons from Badbury.

Was Cerdic's-lea the country from Bokerly Dyke to the sea, now conquered and held by Cerdic, as formerly Natan-leagh had been conquered and held? We cannot say. It would seem, however, certain that Bokerly Dyke had been cast up by the Gewissæ when they made themselves masters of this portion of the land. But there is further evidence.

Grim's Dyke. Running in parts parallel with it, describing a vast curve stretching on the south from Whitsbury Common, and running almost due north to a point 380 feet above the sea, near Clearbury Camp, on the Gwent, is Grim's Dyke. From this point it turns and runs west, and at a mile and a quarter above Wood-yates crosses the Ackling Street. It then approaches Bokerly Dyke, and at a distance of half a mile from it follows its direction in a sweep to the south, and aims at a camp in the Chase. Whether the dykes that have been examined in Cranborne Chase formed a portion of it cannot be determined ; but it is probable that they did.

Grim's Dyke, after aiming at the high ground of what is now Cranborne Chase, but which was formerly open down densely strewn with Romano-British villages, probably followed what is now the line of demarcation of the county of Dorset to the wood above Farnham, where are camps, and along the elevated land over which now runs the high road from Blandford to Shaftesbury. But possibly no rampart was here needed. All this district was well protected by formidable camps. Bugbury, east of Blandford, is within sight of Badbury and Spettisbury, and has traces of a bank running from it, north and south. There are embankments all across this country ; but to solve their purpose and to connect them, demands careful examination by a local antiquary.

Now Grim's Dyke has its moat fronting Bokerly Dyke, and was thrown up by a people who were at war with those who piled up Bokerly. Each nationality dreaded raids from the other. Grim's Dyke has not, unhappily, been explored, but those dykes in Rushmore that have been examined, and which apparently have some connexion with Grim's Dyke, show that they belong to the same period as Bokerly. "If Grim's Ditch ever was a defensive entrenchment," says General Pitt Rivers, "and of the same period as the Dyke, it must have been erected in opposition to the defenders of Bokerly Dyke, as the Ditch is on the south-east side facing the Dyke."¹ The ground behind the Grim's Ditch rises to a ridge of chalk, behind which on the north is the Valley of the Ebble, beyond which again rise other chalk downs. It was clearly desirable for those who would check the advance of an enemy enclosed within the half-moon to prevent them from acquiring this defensive rise of land, for if they got into the Valley of the Ebble the way to Old Sarum was open to them.

Grim's Dyke is vastly inferior as a structure to Bokerly Dyke. The latter, near Woodyates, rose 17 feet above the bottom of the moat when excavated, and must originally have stood at least 3 feet higher. And Grim's Dyke was probably never anything like so high, and depended on the moat and palisade for defence rather than on the embankment.

One other point must be noticed in connexion with Grim's Dyke, and that is, that it rests upon and stretches beyond Whitsbury ; so that either the Gewissæ, when they gained the victory at Charford, did not secure that fortress, or else it was wrested from them later by the Britons, if we admit that Grim's Dyke was thrown up by these latter against the Saxons, who in like manner cast up Bokerly Dyke against the Britons.

¹ Excavations in Bokerly and Wansdyke, p. 59.

General Pitt Rivers says of Wansdyke, with which we are not concerned, and Bokerly Ditches, with which we are: "No reasonable man can ever again assert that either of these dykes are pre-Roman, or that Bokerly Dyke was erected previously to the time of the Emperor Honorius; that is to say, previously to the time when the Roman legions evacuated Britain."¹ With this evidence, what can be said but that the invading West Saxons entrenched themselves in the district of South Hampshire on purpose to maintain themselves there till they were strong enough to push north and west?

Their numbers cannot have been great; a couple of thousand at the outside, but recruited by fresh arrivals from beyond the seas every summer.

The evidence of Bokerly Dyke goes far to show that they remained on the defensive, without immediate prospect of a further advance. So only can we account for the labour expended on these entrenchments.

It is certainly a confirmation of the theory first propounded by Dr. Guest; that the Mount Badon of Gildas and Nennius was Badbury in Dorsetshire, that we find:—

1. That after 519–20 the West Saxons remained inactive for some thirty-three years, so far as not making any advance to north or west.
2. That they appear to have entrenched themselves in their newly acquired settlement, as if content for a while to remain on the defensive only.

Both Dr. Freeman and Mr. Green have accepted the identification and the proposed date; for here we have Badbury precisely where we might expect a battle to be fought, we have the British tradition that a battle was fought, and that the Britons gained the victory—a tradition substantiated by Gildas. And we have a period of peace and arrest in the onward sweep of the enemy following on this supposed battle in 520.

When else was there such a lull?

Henry of Huntingdon admits that the site of Mount Badon, as of the other battles "described by Gildas," were not remembered. "In our times," he says, "the places are unknown."

Nevertheless, Mount Badon has been supposed to be Bath. The Welsh mediæval writers fall into this mistake, though Bath is in a hole and Badon was a hill.

Certainly had Bath been accepted in his time as the site of the battle,

¹ Excavations in Bokerly and Wansdyke, p. xiii.

Henry of Huntingdon would not have expressed himself as he does. Badbury is called in Saxon Baddanbyrig, and Leland describes Bathen Wood near Badbury.¹

That it was occupied by the Romano-British at the time when the Jutes and Saxons landed in Hampshire is almost certain; for although Badbury has not been explored, yet about it are being continually turned up relics of that period, of that same period as the relics found in Bokerly Dyke, coins of the later Roman emperors, Carausius, Claudius Gothicus, and Constantine II, as well as British coins, including one of Cunobelinus, bronze swords, fragments of Samian ware, and British fibulæ.² That Mount Badon should be Bath is incredible. It would have been impossible for the Gewissæ to have broken through the chain of camps that encircled them, and to have penetrated so far, till either Badbury or Old Sarum had fallen. The road west from Sarum is strongly guarded by a series of fortresses. Almost immediately in turning west from Old Sarum, along the Roman Road, begin the formidable entrenchments in Grovely Wood, the Hamshill Ditches, the Kilbury Rings, Hanging Langford Camp, and Church End Ring. Then come the Stockton earthworks, all within ten miles of Sarum. We must further consider that the invaders were comparatively few, that they were foot fighters and not horsemen; and to have raided over forty miles from their base is what they could not have thought of doing. They would have been enfolded and cut to pieces infallibly had they done so.

The Roman name for Bath was Aquæ Solis. What the Celtic name for it originally was we do not know.³ In mediæval Welsh it was Badwn and Caer Vadon. The actual site of the battle having been forgotten, it was supposed by Geoffrey of Monmouth to have been fought at Bath; and the text of Gildas was interpolated with the words "qui prope Sabrinum ostium habetur," after the words "obsessionis Badonici montis." But the paragraph is not found in the best MSS., and was not admitted into the edition of Gildas by Joscelin, London, 1568.

We have no reason whatever for supposing that the name Badwn was given by the Welsh to the ruins of Aquæ Solis till after the Saxons

¹ Itin., iii, p. 55.

² Hutchings' History of Dorset, 3rd ed., by Shipp and Whitworth Hodson, 1868, p. 177.

³ In the Welsh Life of S. David, it is named Yr Enneint Twymyn, "the hot baths." Camden gives it the same name among the Britons, but also Caer Palladur, which he supposes is derived from Pallas or Minerva (Britannia, 1594, pp. 169, 170). Caer Baladr is really the old Welsh name for Shaftesbury, paladr being a shaft or beam. See, however, Geoffrey's Brut, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 64.

Y wnaeth Badon i'r Bwthyn i'r Llundain i'r A. B. C.

had settled there, re-edified it, and called it Bathan-ceaster, of which Caer Vadon is a translation.

The Welsh word badd, a bath (which does duty also for the city-name), is borrowed directly from the English; and baddon,¹ a bath (as well as the city-name), is not Celtic. Applied to the town it is simply Bathonia borrowed.

The Mons Badonicus of Gildas most certainly did not derive its name from any Baths near it, but the name was probably descriptive of the hill.

The bad or badd entering into composition in Celtic names is not rare. There is a Baddon in Cornwall. It may be bad, a boat, and may give the name to a dun or camp as bearing some resemblance to a vessel. But bad is a can word for!

Mr. Green's words concerning the period under consideration may well be quoted. "A fight at Charford on the Lower Avon in 519 seems to mark the close of a conflict in which the provincials were driven from the woodlands whose shrunken remains meet us in the New Forest, and in which the whole district between the Andredsweald and the Lower Avon was secured for English holding. The success at Charford was followed by the political organization of the Conquerors, and Cerdic and Cynric became kings of the West Saxons. Here, however, their success came to an end. Across the Avon the forest belt again thickened into a barrier that held the invaders at bay; for when in the following year, 520, they clove their way through it to the Valley of the Frome, eager perhaps for the sack of a city whose site is marked by our Dorchester, they were met by the Britons at Badbury or Mount Badon, and thrown back in what after events show to have been a crushing defeat. The border line of our Hampshire to the west still marks the point at which the progress of the Gewissæ was arrested by this overthrow, and how severe was the check is shown by the long cessation of any advance in this quarter."² of Argument. a. That from 449 to 577 there was but one period of tranquility, when encroachments were arrested, i.e. from 519 to 552, a generation.

Summary From the Saxon Chronicle we learn:—

b. This was due to the road to Dorchester being blocked to the advance of the Gewissæ by the fortress of Badbury; and that to Cirencester and Bath by Old Sarum.

¹ The badd and baddon quotations cited in Dr. Silvan Evans' Welsh Dictionary s.vv., are all late; and the Bath-names, Badd, Baddwn, Baddon, and Caer Faddon, take us no further back than the Middle Ages, and are merely adaptations.

² The Making of England, 1897, i, pp. 101-2.

c. That it is probable they would have attempted the least formidable of these, and that which would have turned the British flank; and that a crushing reverse in doing so would account for the long period of inaction.

From Gildas we learn:—

a. That a battle was fought at Mount Badon, in which the Saxons were defeated.

b. That, consequent on this defeat, there ensued a period of at least thirty years of tranquility.

From monumental evidence we learn:—

a. That in Pentridge, west of the Avon, a people was cooped in for a period sufficiently long to allow them to erect enormous embankments.

b. That over against these embankments, the people with whom they were at war threw up an opposed range of dykes.

c. That the period when these embankments were cast up was subsequent to 520.

d. That accordingly there is strong probability that these banks were cast up by the Saxons on one side, and by the Britons on the other.

It would therefore appear as evident as possible, from the scanty materials in our possession, that it was the Battle of Mount Badon which produced the inaction of over thirty years, terminating in 552, and that this battle was fought shortly after 519; and, next, that the site of the battle was on the frontiers of the Gewissæ, and Badbury answers to this requirement.

We will now proceed to another point in our consideration of this very difficult investigation.

There are two other dates with which Gildas was intimately connected. In his Increpatio he attacks with great asperity Maelgwn, King of Gwynedd. Now Maelgwn died at the outbreak of the Yellow Plague in 547. This is the date given in the Annales Cambriæ,¹ and with it agree the Irish annals. Thus the Four Masters give under 548, when its worst ravages were felt in Ireland: "The death of Ciaran of Clonmacnois, of Tighernach of Clones, of Mactail, of S. Colum, son of Crimthan, of Finan of Clonard, tutor of the Saints of Ireland. All died of the Plague of Cron-Chonaill. This was the first Buite Chonaill. All the saints died of it but Ciaran and Tighernach." Eochaid, son of Connlo, King of Ulster, also died then.

¹ In the Vita Sti. Teiliavi we have (Book of Llan Dâv, p. 107), "Pestis illa flava . . . traxit Mailconum regem Guenedotix."

Consequently Gildas must have written his Increpatio before 547, probably between 540 and 544.

But he further says that a generation had sprung up since the Battle of Mount Badon, in the period of calm, and in security.

Accordingly we cannot put the composition and publication of this work before 540, twenty years after Mount Badon. The eclipse in 538 and the further eclipse in 540 may have alarmed men's minds, and hurried on the publication.

The second date is that of his summons to Ireland by King Ainmire, which is mentioned in the Life by the monk of Rhuis.

Now Ainmire, according to the Four Masters, was king in 564, and was slain in 566.

There is, indeed, a slight variation in the dates given. Ainmire did not become King de facto till 565, after the murder of Diarmidh, and his life is prolonged according to some authorities till 569.

Now the Annales Cambriæ give 565 as "Navigatio Gildæ in Hybernia," and this exactly agrees with the date of Ainmire's becoming supreme king in Ireland.

Thus the summons to Ireland took place proximately twenty-five years after the issue of the tract De Excidio Britannicæ. In the interim the long peace had been broken, Old Sarum, the most redoubtable fortress on the frontier, had fallen in 552. The Battle of Barbury Hill in 556¹ made the West Saxons masters of the greater part of Wiltshire. Berkshire was overrun, and the way up the Thames was open. Not only so, but the west was also open. Only London and Silchester remained in the hands of the Britons, and these next fell. Then, and then only, was the road clear from all difficulties of advance on Bath, Cirencester and Gloucester, and this advance was made in 577.

We now arrive at that most difficult problem of all to be solved, the date of the birth of Gildas. And the difficulty springs out of the ambiguity of his own words. He says: "Ex eo tempore nunc cives, nunc hostes, vincebant . . . usque ad annum obsessionis Badonici montis . . . quique quadragesimus quartus (ut novi) orditur annus, mense jam uno emenso, qui et meæ nativitatis est."

This has been interpreted in two ways.

¹ Beran-byrig has by some been supposed to be Banbury. But this is impossible. The an in Beran is the Saxon genitive ending, and it would fall away, and the accented syllable Beranbyrig become Ber- or Bar-bury. Barbury was an important fortress on the Ridge Way. The advance into the Avon basin and that of the Severn could not be made till Barbury had fallen.

Barbury Hill well fully with the western side of the West Saxons advance of the Thames Valley

First, Gildas reckoned forty-four years less a month to the siege of Mount Badon from the landing of the Jutes in Thanet.

Secondly, Gildas reckoned that this time elapsed between the Badon victory and his writing the tract.

Bede's Interpretation. The first is the interpretation adopted by Bede, "quadragesimo circiter et quarto anno adventus eorum in Britanniam." But if 520 be the true date of the Battle of Mount Badon, this would give 476 as that of the arrival of the three keels in Thanet, whereas the true date is nearer 449.

The arrival of the "three keels" was certainly not long after the third consulship of Ætius (Agitio ter consuli) spoken of by Gildas, and this was in 446. It was in their dire distress at being abandoned by the Romans that the Britons appealed to the Jutes for aid. Bede in his History says: "In the year of our Lord 449, Martian being made Emperor with Valentinian . . . ruled the empire seven years. Then the nation of the Angles or Saxons, being invited by the aforesaid king (Vortigern), arrived in Britain with three long ships."¹

His date is not quite correct. Marcian was not proclaimed Emperor till 450. Elsewhere Bede gives the fourteenth year of the Emperor Maurice, i.e. 596, as "about the one hundred and fiftieth year" after the arrival of the Angles. This would give 446-7; but he only says "about a hundred and fifty years" before, so that we cannot pin him to an exact date in this passage.²

Again, Bede in his Chronicle gives the date as 453. But the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle gives 449.

If we reckon forty-four years from the landing of the Saxons, we have as the date of Mount Badon 490 or 493, according as we accept 446 or 449 as the date of the arrival of the three keels.

The Chronicon Britannicum,³ drawn up, or concluded, in 1356, gives under 490, "Natus est S. Gildas. Hiis diebus Arturus fortis." But the same Chronicle gives 520 as the date of his arrival in Armorica, and as the Rhuis biographer says that he was aged thirty when he arrived, the date 490 was arrived at simply by deducting 30 from 520.

The date 493 is adopted by De la Borderie.⁴

But neither of these dates was followed by a period of peace; on the contrary, they were followed by a series of disasters.

The Jutes and Saxons were hacking their way through Sussex. In 491 fell Anderida, when the Teutonic invaders "slew all that were therein, nor was there thenceforth one Briton left." Moreover, at ¹ Hist. Eccl., i, c. 15; v, c. 24.

² Ibid., i, c. 23.

³ Dom Morice, Preuves, 1742.

⁴ Revue Celtique, vi, pp. 1-1

this time Camulodunum fell, and the whole of the Saxon Shore was in the hands of the new arrivals. Then came the landing of the Angles and the destruction of Lindunum and Eburacum; and, as we have already seen, the occupation of Hampshire by Jutes and Gewissæ. The victory of Badon Hill therefore cannot have taken place in 490 or 493, as neither of these dates initiated a period of cessation from invasion and conquest.

The victory of Ambrosius, to which Gildas also referred, was succeeded by a time of alternate defeat and victory up to 520. And after 520 ensued a time of rest till 552.

Now on looking at the text, it seems very doubtful whether Gildas could have calculated the years, with a month out, from the first arrival of the Jutes in Thanet. Is it at all likely that there was an accurate record kept of the precise date as to a month of that landing? Moreover, Gildas is referring immediately previous to his statement about Mount Badon, not to the landing of the enemy, but to the victory over them won by Ambrosius Aurelianus, and those who rallied about him. "Ne ad internicionem usque delerentur, duce Ambrosio Aureliano . . . vires capessunt, victores provocantes ad proelium; quâ victoria, Domino annuente, cessit." Then at once he proceeds to say how that from this date (ex eo tempore) the chances of war varied up to the obsession of Mount Badon.

Ussher's Interpretation. The second solution proposed to the puzzle of Gildas is that forty-four years less a month elapsed between the siege of Mount Badon and the writing of his book. This was Ussher's suggestion.¹

This also is the way in which Mommsen reads the passage: "Fortasse sic licebit tradita refingere: quique quadragesimus quartus (est ab eo qui) orditur annus mense jam uno emenso, qui et meæ nativitatis est. Ita Gildas ait scribere se anno ab obsessione montis Badonici itemque a nativitate sua quadragesimo quarto."²

But this presents insuperable difficulties.

In the first place such a treatise as the De Excidio was not dashed off in a month. Its composition cannot be regarded as a fixed date. It is a laboured production, and Gildas tells us that he was for ten years and more thinking of it.³

In the next, if Mount Badon siege was in 520, this would bring the composition to 564, and Maelgwn Gwynedd died in 547.

¹ Britan. Eccl. Antiquitates, Dublin, 1639, i, p. 477.

² Pertz, Mon. Germ. Hist., Chronica Minora, iii, p. 8.

³ "Silui, fateor, cum immenso cordis dolore . . . spacio bilustri temporis vel eo amplius prætereuntis." Ed. Williams, p. 2.

If the De Excidio were written in 540, that would give 496 for the Battle of Mount Badon ; and certainly no continuous period of peace existed from that date to 540, for war was incessant from 496 to 520.

Both explanations of the words of Gildas assume what certainly appears to be his meaning, that he was born in the year in which was fought the Battle of Mount Badon.

Now if we accept this battle as having been fought in 520, at that time Gildas was abbot of Rhuis ; and his heart was hot within him at the scandals in the British race when he was aged ten to fifteen, and he wrote his tractate at the age of twenty to twenty-five.

This is, of course, absurd, and so feeling it, to escape the difficulty, the Battle of Mount Badon has been thrust back to some date in the fifth century. But at no date in that century, and at none other in the sixth but 520, was there the beginning of a long period of inaction on the part of the Saxons and of peace to the Britons, lasting a generation.

Finnian of Clonard, who died in 548, was in correspondence with Gildas relative to penitential discipline. The subject was a delicate one to handle, and could only be discussed by Finnian with a man well on in years.

It is very probable that it was the publication of the De Excidio that induced Finnian to write to Gildas as a severe moralist, relative to the proposed Code. If so, then the age of Gildas would be sixty-six, supposing Finnian wrote in 542 ; an age quite suitable for the discussion of such questions as Finnian proposed.

Having considered the difficulties encumbering the interpretation of the forty-four years as offered by Bede and Ussher, we venture to propose a third : that the forty-four years were reckoned between the two victories, that won by Aurelius Ambrosius, and that won by Arthur at Mount Badon.

Let us look again at the words of Gildas.

“That they might not be utterly destroyed, they (the Britons) take up arms and challenge their victors to battle under Ambrosius Aurelianus. . . . To these men there came victory. From that time, the citizens were sometimes victorious, sometimes the enemy. . . . This continued up to the year of the siege of Mount Badon, and of almost the last great slaughter inflicted upon the rascally crew. And this commences as the forty-fourth year, with one month now elapsed.”

Here we have two fixed dates, the victory of Aurelius and the victory at Mount Badon, between which was a see-saw of success and defeat. What we propose is that the forty-four years less a month applies to this period of see-saw. And that, if the victory of Mount Badon took place in 520, that of Aurelius and the initiation of the see-saw occurred in 476.

If this be allowed, then we will go further, and suggest that the passage, "It is also the year of my birth," refers, not to the year of Mount Badon, but to that of the victory of Aurelius. The explanation proposed may do some violence to the words of Gildas, but in our opinion it offers the only practical solution to the difficulty.

The whole passage is involved, and is rendered the more confused by the introduction of the wretched moralizing of the writer, who explains the alternation in success thus: "In order that the Lord, according to His wont, might try in this nation, the Israel of to-day, whether it loves Him or not."

We would read the disputed passage thus: "Ambrosio Aureliano victoria Domino annuente cessit; ex eo tempore nunc cives, nunc hostes, vincebant, usque ad annum obsessionis Badonici montis, quique quadragesimus quartus, ut novi, orditur annus, mense jam uno emenso (ab anno victoriae Ambrosii), qui et (annus) meae nativitatis est."

This would give 476 as the date of the victory of Aurelius and of the birth of Gildas, and it would make him aged sixty-four when he wrote his book, if that were in 540, or sixty-eight if he wrote in 544.

The dates would stand thus—

- 476. Victory of Aurelius and birth of Gildas.
- 520. Battle of Mount Badon.
- 540-4. Gildas writes the De Excidio.
- 547. Death of Maelgwn Gwynedd.
- 548. Death of Finnian of Clonard.
- 565. Gildas summoned to Ireland by Ainmire.
- 570. Death of Gildas, aged ninety-four.

It is remarkable that the events of his life fall into place if this be accepted. This we shall see in the sequel. Not only so, but it allows us to accept statements relative to Gildas that occur in the Life by Caradog of Llancarfan, in that of S. Cadoc and that of S. Brendan, which otherwise must be rejected.

Then once more the Welsh genealogies insist on Gildas having been a married man, and father of a family. One can see no reason for invention in this case; mediæval authors suppressed such awkward facts when writing the Lives of the Saints, but one cannot conceive a reason for a genealogist inventing and giving currency to a fictitious statement that Gildas had sons and grandsons. But where are they to come in, if we make him born in 520 and die in 570? He could hardly have had a large family under the age of thirty-five, and that brings us to 555, and the De Excidio was written certainly by an ecclesiastic in 540 or 544. In the Life of S. Brendan we are informed that he visited Gildas at Rhuis, and on his return to Ireland had an interview with S. Brigid. Now Brigid died in February, 525; consequently Brendan visited Gildas at Rhuis in the winter of 523-4. We are expressly told it was in winter.

Brigid, moreover, had known Gildas at an earlier period, and he sent her a bell. As she died in 525, this cannot have been as the Rhuis biographer says, "in the time of Ainmericus, king over all Ireland;" for Ainmire began his reign in 565, as we have already seen. But if Gildas had become acquainted with Brigid it must have been before 520, and this again throws his birth back some way into the fifth century.

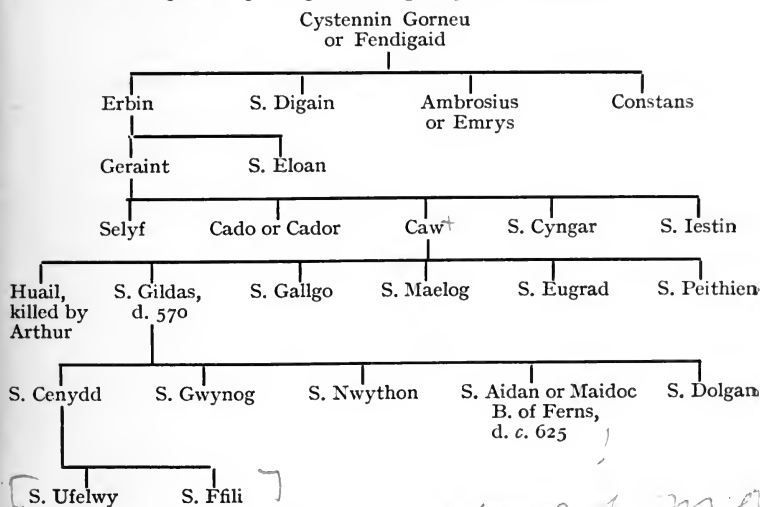

We must accordingly conclude either that Mount Badon was fought in the latter part of the fifth century; but this is impossible, as there was no period of a generation of tranquility, such as Gildas describes, in any part of the fifth century; or else we must accept the interpretation of the words of Gildas we have suggested, however strained it may appear.

Having thus settled, as far as it is possible to settle, the date of the birth of Gildas, we shall be able to proceed with his Life, and show how that, the date being conceded, we are able to fit into his life without violence the various incidents that are recorded connected with his career.

II. THE LIFE OF GILDAS.

Gildas was born in Arecluta (the country "on the Clyde"), Renfrewshire, according to Skene, and was the son of Caw, called by the Rhuis biographer Caunus, and by the other Nau.

The Welsh genealogists give the pedigree as follows—

[S. Ufelwy S. Ffili] Is mss? Damm the 9th mss?

+ of course (Caw) only comes here after he

They name many other children of Caw, but in some cases sons, no doubt, stand for grandsons, or such as belonged to the family and tribe.

In the Life of the Rhuis biographer, only four brothers and a sister are named. The second biographer, following Welsh genealogical tradition, says: "Nau, the King of Scotia . . . had twenty-four sons, victorious warriors." The genealogists, however, do not give the names of quite that number.¹

The eldest son was Huail, called by the Rhuis monk Cuillus, "a very active man in war;" another was Maelog, of Llowes; Egreas is the Welsh Egrad; Alleccus, the Welsh Galgo, and a sister, Peteova or Peteona, is in Welsh Peithien.

Owing to the incursions of the Picts and Scots into Arecluta, Caw's sons were forced to abandon their native land and to fly to Wales, with the exception of Huail, who gathered about him those who remained of the fighting men, and lived a wild, piratical life.

The author of the second Life hints that all the sons of Caw had been warriors in early days, doubtless Gildas included. But he fled with his brothers, except Huail, to Gwynedd, where they were well received by Cadwallon Lawhir, the king, and by his son Maelgwn.

Cadwallon had expelled the Goidels out of Mona, and he gave to the sons of Caw lands in the island, where they accordingly settled.

Probably it was in Arecluta that Gildas had married; for the Welsh genealogies assure us that he had five children: Cenydd, Gwynog, Nwython, Maidoc or Aidan, and Dolgan.

But perhaps about this time, or shortly after, he lost his wife, and resolved on embracing the ecclesiastical profession. He placed himself for his training under Illtyd at Llantwit. "Now, the blessed Gildas . . . is entrusted by his parents to the charge of S. Hildutus, to be instructed by him."²

This could not have been when the family was in Strathclyde; it must have been later. And there is a mistake in what the biographer states as to his having been entrusted to S. Illtyd by his parents. He was a young man, not a boy, at the time.

Among his companions were Samson and Paul.

"Of these men, the most holy Samson was afterwards Archbishop of the Britons, whilst Paul presided as bishop over the Osissmi." The mention of Samson as archbishop indicates the lateness of the period at which this account was drawn up. The archbishopric was not founded till 848, and it must have taken more than a century for the fable to have grown up that Samson had ever exercised metropolitan jurisdiction.

¹ See ii, pp. 93-4.

² Vita I^{ma}, p. 326.

The Life of S. Paul gives Dewi, Samson and Gildas as the fellow-pupils of that Saint under Illtyd. And the same four are named in the Life of S. Illtyd.

We must set aside as mere hagiographical rhetoric what the biographer says: "From the fifteenth year of his age, through the whole period of the present life which he lived in this world, up to the very last day on which he was called by the Lord, it was only three times in the week, as we have learnt from a trustworthy source, that he took a most scanty food for his body. He buffeted his body with frequent fastings and with protracted vigils . . . he withstood vices, while he struggled against the temptations of the devil, and tortured himself in resisting the pleasures of the body."

This may be true enough of his mode of life after he had embraced the monastic discipline, but that cannot have been when he was fifteen, but rather when aged thirty or more.

The Rhuis biographer probably knew nothing about Gildas having been a family man, but we cannot acquit Caradog, or whoever wrote the second Life. To him the genealogies were accessible. But it seemed more becoming to a saint not to admit this, and he therefore skimmed over this early episode, falsifying his facts to suit the ideas of the twelfth century.

"Nau," says he, "the King of Scotia . . . had twenty-four sons, victorious warriors." Actually they had been beaten and driven into ignominious flight by the Picts. "One of these was named Gildas, whom his parents engaged in the study of literature. . . . He eagerly and diligently studied among his own people in the seven arts until he reached the age of youth, when, on becoming a young man, he speedily left the country."

In the first Life we are informed that the youthful Gildas performed some miracles. As S. Illtyd "dwelt with his disciples in a narrow island, confined, and squalid with its arid soil," Gildas prayed, and "the island expanded in all directions, blossoming round with various flowers."

We obtain an explanation of this from the Life of S. Illtyd (c. 13). Ynys was a term applied not only to islands, but also to monastic colonies. At Llantwit Illtyd desired to reclaim the rich alluvial soil between it and the sea, and set to work with his disciples to build a sea wall to enclose it, and thus extend rich pasture-land to enhance the territory of his ynys. The Rhuis biographer did not understand the early meaning given to the term, and so converted the circumstance into a miracle. He goes on to relate how that S. Illtyd sowed the island, but the sea birds destroyed his corn; then Gildas, Samson and Paul drove them into a barn. The story appears in the Life of Paul, in that of Samson, and in that of Illtyd; but in the two latter the miracle is attributed to Samson alone, in that of Paul to that saint. The biographer of Gildas had these Lives before him. He adopted the incident, and added the name of his hero.

The Rhuis author adds that Gildas was at other schools beside that of Illtyd. "Cum plurimorum doctorum scholas peragrasset." He apparently went to Ireland, there to finish his monastic training. He was in Ireland when an event took place which recalled him to Britain.

Huail was the only one of the brothers who did not embrace the ecclesiastical profession. He seems to have been a filibuster. "Hueil major natu belliger assiduus et miles famosissimus nulli regi obedivit, nec etiam Arthuro. Affligebat eundem, commovebat inter utrumque maximum furorem" (Vita 2^{da}). He would often swoop down from Scotia, plunder and burn in Wales. The use of the term Scotia for Scotland is indicative of the late date at which this Life was drawn up. Clearly Huail had collected the remnant of his clansmen in Strathclyde, and carried on a wanton war of devastation against his own race, in place of assailing the scattered foes of the Britons, the Picts, and Goidels. A council of war was held in Minau—apparently Manaw, the Isle of Man—and he was surrounded there and killed.¹

The Welsh traditionary story is different. According to that, Huail ventured to make love to a lady whom Arthur admired, and this led to Arthur having Huail's head hacked off on the Maen Huail, a stone still pointed out in S. Peter's Square, Ruthin.²

The slaying of Huail caused great offence. Gildas, who was at the time in Ireland, hastened to Wales to exact retribution. Several ecclesiastics intervened, and as a blood fine Arthur surrendered several parcels of land to the family of Caw, after which Gildas consented to give Arthur the Kiss of Peace.

It is possible enough that the foundations made in Radnorshire by some of the brothers of Huail were on land thus, and then, granted in mulct for the execution.

In Ireland Gildas had made the acquaintance of S. Brigid. It is

¹ "A Scotia veniebat sæpissime, incendia ponebat, prædas ducebat cum victoria ac laude. Unde rex universalis Britanniae audiens magnanimum juvenem talia fecisse et æqualia facere persecutus est victoriosissimum juvenem et optimum, ut aiebant et sperabant indigenæ, futurum regem. In persecutione autem hostili et in conventu bellico in insula Minau interfecit juvenem prædatorem." Vita 2^{da}, ed. Williams, p. 402.

² See under S. HUAIL.

convents better served than in a inferior

pretended by the Rhuis biographer that he went to North Britain, and did something there towards the conversion of the Picts. That he did revisit Strathclyde is possible enough. If he had anything to do with the Picts we cannot say; he has left no traces behind him of any spiritual work wrought there.

The author of the second Life says that Gildas had brought from Ireland with him a beautiful and sweet-sounding bell; and that he went with it to Nant Carfan, where he shewed it to S. Cadoc, who greatly admired it and wanted to buy it. Gildas refused, alleging that he was on his way to Rome, and purposed offering it "to the bishop of the Roman Church." Cadoc was forced to swallow his disappointment. However, when Gildas arrived in Rome, and the Pope knew that it had been greatly desired by Cadoc, he refused to accept it; and on his return, Gildas made a present of it to the Abbot of Nant or Llan Carfan. This incident occurs also in the Life of S. Cadoc (c. 23).

On his way back from Rome it was that Gildas landed on the Isle of Houat off the coast of Broweroc; and after a brief sojourn there ("aliquamdiu"), crossed over to the mainland, to the long spit that, like a crab's claw encloses the inland sea of the Morbihan.

That Isle of Houat was itself but a remaining fragment of the ancient coastline that ran from the spit of Quiberon to Le Croissic. Long before the historic period the sea had broken through and attacked another barrier, partly of sand dunes and partly of granite cliffs. Finding one weak spot, a fault in the granite, it had burst through that and formed the inland sea of the Morbihan enclosed between the tongues of land of Locmariaquer and Sarzeau.

Entering this lagoon, Gildas drew his boat to land, and ascending the peninsula of Sarzeau, lighted on an ancient camp, "quoddam castrum in Monte Reuvisii in prospectu maris," and there erected a monastery.¹

This took place, as we are assured by the Rhuis biographer, when he was aged thirty, and at the time when Childeric, son of Meroveus, was king of the Franks, a prince still pagan.² The Chronicon Britannicum gives the date 520.³ Now Childeric this cannot have been, for he died in 481, and was succeeded by Clovis, baptized in 496, who died in 511. Childebert succeeded, and reigned to 558. The king then must have been Childebert, and the biographer must have been very badly instructed in early Frank history to make such a blunder. He saw in the MS. before him a name Childe . . . probably with the last letters illegible, and concluded that this was Childeric, son of Meroveus. It is possible enough that in the early portion of his reign Childebert may have been a bad Christian, and some remark to this effect may have led the late biographer to say that the king was "gentilium errori deditus."

¹ Vita 1^{ma}, ed. Williams, p. 348.

² "Childericus enim eo tempore Merovei filius gentilium errori deditus imperabat Francis, quod ex gestis veterum prudens lector cognoscere potest." The biographer in these words seems to let us see he had been dipping into Gregory of Tours, but being at sea as to the true period of the life of Gildas he misplaced his arrival at Rhuis by some forty to forty-fifty years.

³ This chronicle was drawn up in 1356; Dom Morice, Memoires pour Servir, etc., 1742.

Probably at this time Brendan paid a visit to Gildas, and was churlishly received, in the winter of 523-4. If Gildas were born in 476, then he made his first settlement at Rhuis in the autumn of 520.

We are told that Gildas asked Brendan to undertake the supervision of his settlement, but that Brendan declined. This is intelligible enough. Gildas wanted to return to Britain; he had with him but a handful of followers; he was unknown as an ecclesiastical leader; he probably contented himself with obtaining a concession of the old camp and some adjoining land from the Count, and then desired to revisit Britain that he might collect disciples for his monastery. So only can we reconcile the two accounts we have. The Rhuis biographer says nothing of his visit to and residence at Glastonbury, and the author of the Vita 2^{da} passes lightly over all that took place in Armorica.

Leaving Rhuis with some few of his followers, Gildas departed for Britain.

Professor Hugh Williams is disposed to reject the whole account by the author of Vita 2^{da} relative to the residence of Gildas at Glastonbury after his return from the Continent. "All the sections in reference to Glastonbury and Gildas' tarrying there can be no otherwise regarded than as a piece of literary fiction."

But it is never well to reject traditions that are precise when reconciliation is possible.

Caradog, or whoever wrote the Vita 2^{da}, says that Gildas was seven years abroad, before returning to Britain. If our reckoning be right, this would be from 527.

"At the end of the seventh year he returned, with a large mass of volumes, to Greater Britain . . . and great numbers of scholars flocked to him from all parts."¹

Gildas had now a part to play, to qualify for a saint. This could only be done in one way, by undergoing austerities.

¹ Vita 2^{da}, p. 394. This is difficult to reconcile with his meeting S. Finnian.

"It was his habit to go into a river at midnight, where he would remain unmoved until he had said the Lord's Prayer thrice. Having done this, he would repair to his oratory, and pray there on his knees unto the Divine Majesty until broad daylight. He was wont to sleep moderately, and to lie upon a stone, clothed with only a single garment. He used to eat without satisfying his wants, contented with his share of the heavenly reward."¹

On his return to Britain he went into "the district of Pepidiauc," now Dewisland, in Pembrokeshire, where he preached every Lord's Day in a church on the seashore. This is the Caermorfa of the Life of S. David by Giraldus, and here is supposed to have occurred the incident of his becoming mute because Non was present in the church, pregnant with David.² Unfortunately for the story, David is represented as having been a fellow disciple of Gildas in the school of S. Illtyd, in the very early Life of S. Paul. Moreover, the same story is told of Bishop Ailbe, who baptized David, and was his kinsman. The purpose of his visit to Pebydiog is obvious enough. There was the great monastery ruled by Paulinus, that sent so many missionaries to Ireland. He sought thence to glean some restless spirits who would attach themselves to himself and follow him to Armorica.

From Pebydiog he went with like purpose to Llancarfan, where he propitiated Cadoc with the gift of the bell. "And Cadoc, abbot of the church of Nantcarfan, asked the teacher Gildas to superintend the studies of his schools for the space of one year."³

Cadoc, in fact, wanted to absent himself and visit Scotland. Gildas consented, and whilst he was at Llancarfan, "he himself wrote out the work of the four Evangelists, a work that still remains in the church of S. Cadoc, covered all over with gold and silver."⁴

"At the close of the year, and when the scholars were retiring from study, the saintly abbot Cadoc, and the excellent master Gildas, mutually agreed to repair to two islands, viz., Ronech and Echin. Cadoc landed in the one nearer to Wales, and Gildas in that which lies over against England."⁵

The author of Vita 2^{da} pretends that the saints lived on the islands for seven years. But the Life of S. Cadoc says that the saint was wont to retire to the islets only for the season of Lent. "In the days

¹ Vita 2da, p. 396.

² Ibid., pp. 398, 400. "In tempore Trifini regis." Triphun, who was the son of Clotri, is mentioned also in the Life of S. David, and the story of the silence of Gildas before the pregnant Non is told in the same Life.

³ Ibid., pp. 404, 406.

⁴ Ibid., p. 406; see ii, p. 14.

⁵ Ibid., p. 406.

of Lent" he was there, but "on Palm Sunday he returned to Nantcarfan."¹

The author of Vita 2^{da} cannot state the truth when he makes Gildas occupy the islet for seven years. He seems to have mistaken what is said in the Life of S. Cadoc. In that Cadoc departs from his monastery for the north of Britain, and remains away seven years. In it Gildas arrives from Ireland with his bell, after the return of Cadoc from North Britain. Then follows the story of the bell, not told in the same words as in the Life of Gildas, but the same in its details.

In the Life of S. Finnian of Clonard we read that he went to two holy men inhabiting the Isle of Echni.² They are not named, but it is not improbable that these were Gildas and Cadoc. The date can be fixed fairly closely, for Finnian returned to Ireland before the death of Muirdach, King of the Hy Cinnsealach, who died in 525, according to the most approved computation.

A curious story is given in the Life of S. Finnian relative to his intercourse with Gildas whilst he was in Wales, but he doubtless revisited Wales later.

He went to Cill-muine, in Pebydiog, and there met Gildas and Cadoc and David, and found Gildas and David in vehement contest for supremacy. It was decided that Cadoc should judge between them. Cadoc, however, was unwilling to offend either party, and he thrust the responsibility on Finnian, who adjudged the supremacy to David.³

What would seem to be the basis of this story is that whilst Gildas was in Pebydiog he did endeavour to wrest from David his succession to the abbacy of Ty Gwyn or the Old Bush, but failed; after which he visited Llanancarfan. It was probably then that Gildas and Cadoc agreed to spend Lent on the two islets, Ronech and Echni. These are the Steep and Flat Holmes, in the Bristol Channel; and on these alone in England are found the entire-leaved peony and the wild leek. It is supposed that these plants have lingered on there from the gardens of the ancient settlers in monastic days.

Whilst on the Steep Holmes Gildas built himself a chapel and a cell, and is credited with having elicited a spring. He lived on birds' eggs and fish; and occasionally visited Cadoc, who returned his visits.⁴

¹ "Quadragesimalibus diebus consuevit Sanctus Cadocus manere in duabus insulis, videlicet, Barren et Echni; in die vero Palmarum veniebat Nantcaruan, ibi expectans, et faciens Paschale servitium." Cambro-British Saints, p. 45.

² Vita S. Finniani in Cod. Sal., col. 193.

³ Life of Finnian of Clonard in Book of Lismore, pp. 222-3.

⁴ Vita 2^{da}, p. 406. Confirmed by the "Life of S. Oudoceus" in Book of Llan Dáv, p. 138, but Echni is given for Ronech. Ronech means the Isle of "Seals" (moel-ron).

The islands had at last to be abandoned on account of the piratical incursions of the Northmen.¹

From Llanccarfan, Gildas went to Glastonbury. He had doubtless collected some disciples in Pebydiog, and had added to the band some of the pupils of Cadoc, who desired to see the world. Now he sought to swell the body by adherents gained at Glastonbury.

At Glastonbury Gildas was well received. "He built a church there . . . in which he fasted and prayed assiduously, clad in goats' hair, giving to all an irreproachable example of a good religious life."²

Whilst Gildas was at Glastonbury a strange incident took place, according to the author of the second Life.

At this time Melwas was king of what is now called Somerset; he had carried off Gwenhwyfar or Guinevere, Arthur's queen. Thereupon Arthur laid siege to Glastonbury, whither Melwas had retired, but was not able to effect much, "propter munitiones arundineti et fluminis ac paludis causa tutelæ;" and Melwas retained Gwenhwyfar there for a whole year.

Arthur had convoked the levies of "Cornubia and Dibnenia," and the monks of the Holy Isle felt the inconvenience of the siege. The abbot, along with Gildas, interposed; and Arthur, very unheroically, expressed himself ready to forgive and forget if his wife were sent back to him. Gwenhwyfar was accordingly returned to her husband, and the two princes met on good terms; and in token of fraternal union visited together the church of Glastonbury.³

Geoffrey of Monmouth very rarely condescends to give a date to the events he relates. When he does, we may suspect that he had some authority for it. He says that Arthur died in 542.⁴ The Annales Cambriæ give the date as 537.⁵ But as they antedate the Battle of Mount Badon by four years, so here they may give a date some five years too early. The Welsh chronicle in the Red Book of Hergest makes an interval of twenty-two years between the victory of Mount Badon and the death of Arthur.⁶ The Annales Cambriæ make twenty-one years. Although very little reliance can be placed on the Welsh chronicle, and less still on Geoffrey of Monmouth, yet both

¹ "Venerunt piratæ de insulis Orcadibus, qui afflixerunt illum raptis ab eo suis famulis servientibus et ductis in exilium cum spoliis et omnibus suæ habitationis supellectilibus." Vita 2^{da}, p. 408. For all his asceticism, Gildas was careful not to retire to solitude without servants to wait on him, and suitable furniture for his cell.

² Ibid., p. 410.

³ Ibid., pp. 408, 410. Melwas is the Meliaudes of the Romancers, who make him father of Tristan.

⁴ Hist. Reg. Brit., xi, c. 2.

⁵ Ed. Phillimore in Y Cymmrodor, ix, p. 154.

⁶ O Oes Gwrtheyrn in Bruts, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 404.

witness, along with the Cambrian annals, to there having existed a tradition that Arthur survived the famous victory some twenty-one or twenty-two years. There would accordingly be no anachronism in supposing that he and the chieftain of the Domnonii were at war about 530-534, the period during which we suppose that Gildas was at Glastonbury. And it may be to this domestic broil that he alludes, when he says that during a generation after Mount Badon peace reigned, so far that the incursions of the enemy had ceased, but that it had been broken by civil broils, "Cessantibus licet externis bellis, sed non civilibus."

The author of the second Life pretends that Gildas remained at Glastonbury, wrote his Epistle there, which he calls his History of the Kings of Britain, and died there.

We shall see, in the sequel, what perhaps gave rise to this idea. On the other hand, the monk of Rhuis knew nothing of the visit to Britain and residence at Glastonbury. Yet that Gildas should return after having obtained a concession of land on the Sarzeau peninsula, in order to collect a number of followers to fill the large monastery he had founded in Brittany can hardly be questioned.

There is collateral evidence of Gildas having been in South Wales. In the Iolo MSS. he is said to have founded Llanildas, afterwards called Y Wig Fawr (the Great Wood), in Glamorgan.¹ This is probably Wick, subject to S. Bride's Major, which, however, Rees gives as dedicated to S. James.² That is no more than a Norman or English rededication.

Moreover, Aidan or Maidoc, son of Gildas, was actually left in Pebydiog with S. David at an early age, as pupil. This shows that Gildas had been there, and that although the contention for the mastery had been sharp between them, it was patched up, and in token of reconciliation, Gildas committed his boy to be fostered and trained by David.³

Many of the brothers of Gildas were in Anglesey; but he does not appear to have gone into Northern Wales.

At length, after an absence of seven years, Gildas returned with a body of recruits to Rhuis, and the monastery was organised on an extensive scale.

When the biographer speaks of the "Mountain of Reuvisium" he conveys to the mind an entirely false impression. Rhuis stands but a hundred feet above the Atlantic on a tableland that extends to Sarzeau, and thence declines gently to the sea. The spot is bleak and wind-swept, but towards the Morbihan is tree-grown and covered with vineyards. This is the furthest point to the North where wine is made, and such as is made is little better than the poor native cider. Originally there was more timber, but not on the plateau. Towards the ocean the high ground breaks down in precipitous cliffs, but further south-east the rocks give way, and the bay of Sucinio is formed, on which stands the castle of the ancient Dukes of Brittany. The whole of the coast has greatly altered since Gildas settled there, as the granite is soft and full of faults. The sea has gained on the land, and in places has completely changed the coastline.

¹ P. 220. ² Essay on Welsh Saints, p. 338. ³ See his Life, i, pp. 116-26.

The monastery of Rhuis had its wood, and a church was erected in this part of the promontory. It was called Coetlann. Here, we are informed that Gildas destroyed a dragon, and to this day the fosse is pointed out in which it was supposed to have lain.

Gildas undoubtedly gained the favour of Weroc I, the Chief or Count of the British settlers who occupied all the country round Vannes.

It was, perhaps, due to him that he obtained a concession at Castennec on the Blavet. Here a finger of hill projects, and the river makes a loop round it. The sides are steep, and the summit was crowned by the old Roman town of Sulim, fallen, when Gildas settled there, into complete ruin.

Here he established a small monastery, not among the ruins, but on the neck of land at a place called Castennec. With this establishment, a curious circumstance is associated. Among the wreckage of the old town was a granite image of Venus, stark naked, and by no means decent, standing 7 feet high, with a bandlet about the head on which are cut the letters IIT. Before it stood a huge granite basin. The image received religious worship, and we may well suppose that in accordance with their strong sense of the necessity of doing away with idols—and such an idol as this—Gildas and his disciple Budoc would throw it down. They did more, they buried it under the foundations of their monastery a little distance off.

When the Northmen devastated the country in the tenth century, the establishment at Castennec was destroyed and was never again restored. But at a subsequent period, in digging among the rubbish heaps, the image was disclosed, set up, and at once received a revived cult. Those afflicted with gout and rheumatism rubbed their limbs against it, and made offerings to it; women, after their confinements bathed in the stone basin before it; and rites were celebrated in its honour characterised by gross indecency.

The Bishop of Vannes thundered against it, and at last Count Pierre de Lannion removed it to his castle at Baud, and had it chiselled over to render it a little more decorous. His château has disappeared, as has the Castennec monastery, as has the Roman city of Sulim, but the Venus of Quinipili still stands serene, looking out of her blank eyes, having witnessed the destruction of castle, monastery and town.¹

A path from where stood Castennec leads down to a combe through which trickles a tiny rill, then ascends a hillside to where stands a farmhouse among ancient chestnut trees. From this, a rapid descent leads to the oratory of Gildas and his disciple Budoc under overhanging granite rocks at the brink of the river, to which oratory they retired for Lent and at times when they desired solitude.²

Gildas built up a wall on the river face and so enclosed a space under the rock. There was a little water oozing out at the spot, hardly a clear spring, as the biographer terms it, but affording sufficient drinking water.

That Gildas was able to glaze the east window of his cell is recorded as something miraculous.

The chapel is still where Gildas formed his oratory; it has been rebuilt and restored, but preserves early features. The roof is a lean-to against the rock, the wall being run further out than in the time of Gildas. A mass of granite outside has been hewn into steps and a platform to serve as a pulpit.

Within the oratory are two compartments; the outer contains an altar to S. Budoc (Bieuzy), that within to S. Gildas. On the left side of the latter is a block of masonry and granite rock to serve as a table for the pain bénit that is distributed to the pilgrims on the occasion of a Pardon.

A slab of resonant diorite on a pedestal serves as a bell. It is struck with a pebble and rings at the Sanctus, Consecration, and Communion. It is traditionally attributed to Gildas. Against the wall is the inscription:

Etat blamah hon doar_sanel
Un ermitagie peur mair-vet
Beba vein glas hon doai eit cloh
En hon chapel groeit en urroh.

The Pardons are on January 29, and Whitsun Monday, but Mass

¹ De la Borderie, Hist. de Bretagne, i, pp. 180-2; Baring-Gould, Brittany London, 1901, pp. 45, 47-8.

² "Tunc denique construxit parvum oratorium super ripam fluminis Blaveti sub quadam eminenti rupe, ab occidente in orientem ipsam concavans rupem et ad latus ejus dextrum erigens parietem congruum fecit oratorium, sub quo de rupe emanare fecit fontem perlucidum." Vita 1^{ma}, pp. 348, 350.

FOUNDATIONS OF GILDAS AND HIS SONS AND GRANDSONS IN ARMORICA.

is also said in the chapel on the third Sunday in July, and on the fourth Sunday after Midsummer Day.

The Blavet and its tributaries would seem to have been claimed by Gildas as a special field for operations. Possibly, he may have thought that he had some rights there. It is conceivable that his grandfather Geraint had been granted a domain there, for we find S. Gérard with its minihi or sanctuary higher up the river. His uncle Solomon or Selyf may also have been the saint and martyr commemorated at Guern, where is his martyrium.¹ We have, unhappily, no documentary evidence to connect these saints with Gildas. But it is certainly a remarkable coincidence that about the Blavet we should find the names of members of his family in a cluster.

Further down the river is Languidic, the Lan of Cenydd, the crippled son of Gildas, who has also a chapel at Plumelin. Gildas himself has a chapel at Malguenac, and a monastic settlement of his was at Locminé.

This latter stood where is now Moréac, and not on the site of the present town. In 919, owing to the incursions of the Northmen, the monks of Rhuis, bearing the body of their founder, fled to Locminé, where they were joined by the monks of that community, and all retired together to Berry, and remained at Bourg-Dieu or Déols,† till 1000, when Rhuis, and after that, Locminé, were restored.

Ten years after the departure of Gildas from Britain, he composed his book "in which he reprov'd five of the kings of that island who had been ensnared in various crimes and sins."²

The book De Excidio Britanniae certainly appeared before 547, the year in which Maelgwn Gwynedd died of the Yellow Plague, probably in 544, twenty-four years after the Battle of Mount Badon, and before the peace came to an end. It produced effects which we shall now note.

Gildas was the father of five children. Cenydd had been a member of the college of Cadoc, but afterwards had settled in Gower.

In his Increpatio Gildas had assailed Vortipore, King of Demetia. "Like the pard art thou in manners and wickedness of various colours, though thy head is now becoming grey; upon a throne full of guile, and from top to bottom defiled by various murders and adulteries, thou worthless son of a good king, as Manasseh of Hezekiah."³

Gower was not in Demetia, but it is possible enough that Vortipore

¹ Not Solomon, King of Brittany, killed in 874, but an earlier king of the same name. See under S. SELYF.

² Vita I^{ma}, p. 352.

³ De Excidio, ed. Williams, p. 72.

+ Dolensio Kernum Sicut Rethem p...
 + Dolensio Kernum Sicut Rethem p...

may have had sufficient influence in it to make residence there no longer possible for Cenydd; and it may have been on this account that he migrated to Brittany and placed himself in his father's hands. Another son was Aidan, or Maidoc; he had been placed with S. David; and probably he also had to depart and shelter himself in Ireland.

Of Dolgan we know nothing, and next to nothing of Nwython. But Gwynog had been settled in Powys, and he now very probably had to escape from the wrath of Cuneglas, prince, it would seem, of a district in North Wales, also violently abused by Gildas as "wallowing in the old filth of thy wickedness, from the years of thy youth, thou bear, rider of many . . . despiser of God and contemner of His decree, thou Cuneglas (meaning, in the Roman tongue, Thou tawny butcher). . . Why, in addition to innumerable lapses, dost thou, having driven away thy wife, cast thine eyes upon her dastardly sister, who is under a vow to God of perpetual chastity?" Gwynog probably fled to Armorica, and it is just possible that he may be the Eunius who became Bishop of Vannes at a later period.

Cenydd was a father of a family, and there is evidence of his sons having also settled in the neighbourhood of Vannes and of the Blavet.

Caffo, one of the brothers of Gildas, had been a disciple of S. Cybi in Môn. Probably on account of the insults cast at Maelgwn by Gildas, he was constrained to leave, but the shepherds of the King, resenting the outrage, killed him at Rhosfyr, now Newborough, and he is accounted one of the martyrs of Anglesey.

Alleccus, or Gallgo, another, there is some reason to think, was constrained to fly the resentment of Maelgwn, and take refuge in Ireland.

Maelog, or Meilig, also had been in Môn, with Cybi. He apparently had also to escape, and finally settled at Llowes.

It is not easy to read the "querulous epistle" of Gildas with patience. He has left unsaid so much that we desire to know, and has poured forth his denunciations in language so extravagant and venomous, as to disgust the reader. M. J. Loth says:—"There are heaps of contradictions, puerilities, ineptitudes of every kind in the work of this Jeremiah of the tenth class, whose ignorance, outside the Scriptures, defies all comparison, and whose want of judgment betrays itself in incredible childishness."¹

The bird that befouls its own nest is accounted a very ill bird indeed. Yet it is perhaps due to the intemperate violence of the invective of Gildas against those of his own race and blood, that the work has been preserved. Saxons and English cherished the book, and were able to produce it against the Welsh, as evidence of their vices and follies, given by one of themselves.

¹ Les mots Latins dans les langues brittoniques, Paris, 1892.

Foot. de l'Évêque off. = Just. Call. with

In this sorry work, Gildas throws dirt at the princes of his native land, against his own cousin Constantine, against Maelgwn, the large-hearted benefactor of his family. He heaps abuse on the people from whom he sprung. He could see no heroism in the Britons when they rose against the Roman invaders. Boudica, whose daughters had been outraged, and herself scourged with rods by the Roman tribunes, was in no degree justified in resenting these infamies. She is to Gildas only a "deceitful lioness," and the Britons are "crafty foxes." He varies his metaphor, later on, to liken them to barndoor fowl under the trusty wings of the parent birds, the Romans. His own flesh and blood are cowards. "They present their backs, instead of their shields, to the pursuers, their necks to the sword, while chill terror runs through their bones. They hold forth their hands to be bound like women; so that it became a proverb and derision: The Britons are neither brave in war, nor faithful in peace." If, however, they rise against their Imperial oppressors, they are "stiff-necked and stubborn-minded, ungrateful rebels." Throughout, Gildas shows himself to be Roman-minded.

National independence he cannot away with. At the bottom of all the disasters that befell Britain lay ingratitude to and severance from the Roman Empire. Aurelius Ambrosius is praised, but mainly because he was of noble Roman blood. When a prophet thunders so loudly against the vices of his race, one naturally desires to look home, at his own monastic household, and see if that was clean.

A glance at the Penitential of Gildas suffices to show that the same abominations which were rampant in the British world, had found a lodging within the walls of his monastery, and had to be provided against.

And when he assails his fellow countrymen as cowards, we ask what token of courage did Gildas show in denouncing the chiefs secular and ecclesiastical in his own neighbourhood at Rhuis, for their infamous lives? His biographer maintains silence on this point.

It must have been a satisfaction to Gildas that his old friend Cadoc should take it into his head also to come to Brittany, and to the same parts. But Cadoc was too discreet to settle close to the hot-tempered Gildas. He selected for himself a site very similar to that chosen by Gildas at Rhuis, at the edge of another inland sea, that of Etel.

De la Villemarqué gives "a tradition still circulating in Armorica,"¹ relative to the meeting of these saints, and a dispute as to whether

¹ La Légende Celtique, Paris, 1861, pp. 201-4.

Virgil had been saved. Unhappily, no statement made by De la Villemarqué, unless established on other authority, can be trusted, and it may well be questioned whether the Breton peasant would know anything about Virgil. The story has been told under S. CADOC.¹

Gildas would appear to have been on very good terms with Conmore, Count of Poher, and regent of Domnonia. This Conmore was a bold, ambitious and unscrupulous man. On the death of Jonas, King of Domnonia, he seized the rule. He married the widow and assumed the regency for the young Judual, son of Jonas, who, however, mistrusting his uncle, fled.

The original caer or stronghold of Conmore had been Carhaix, the old Roman Vorganium, in an elevated bleak situation. Owing to the favour in which Gildas stood with him, Conmore surrendered to him Carnoet, near Carhaix, on still higher ground, dominating the place.

The river Hières flows through a lovely valley, between well-wooded and rocky hills; and by the water stands the chapel of the peniti of Gildas. Thence a road scrambles to the high ground on which stands the village of Carnoet, where a cluster of squalid cottages surrounds a bran-new and very ugly modern church. Beyond the village a way still mounts to the highest point of the ridge, that commands the country for many miles round, and looks down on Carhaix. Under the lea of this point, in a well-timbered nook, beside an oozing spring, lies the sixteenth century chapel of S. Gildas. The summit of the hill shooting above it is crowned by an earthwork. M. de la Borderie is mistaken in supposing this to be the remains of a monastic enclosure. "Sur un mamelon très dominant existe une grande enceinte circulaire fermée de rejets de terre considérables et de fossés de sept mètres de profondeur; or, on le sait, les monastères bretons primitifs de quelque importance devaient toujours être, comme ceux des Scots, clos d'un rempart de ce genre, soit que le fondateur l'élevât lui-même, soit qu'il s'établît (comme à Rhuis) dans un fort barbare on un camp romain préexistant."²

The camp is of the tenth century, and is of Northman origin. There can be no mistake about it. It consists of a tump scooped out at top, with a loop bank at the side, forming a bass-court. Its counterpart may be seen on the Alun, below S. Davids. Excavations in such camps prove the period to which they belong.

In the chapel is a stone sarcophagus, sunk in the floor, and regarded as having been the bed of the saint. On the Pardon in January, the peasants offer cocks and hens; and in the North aisle are three ranges of coops to contain the fowls, which cackle through Mass, and are sold afterwards, the proceeds going to the repair of the chapel.

¹ ii, p. 28.

² Hist. de Bretagne, i, p. 440.

Conmore lost his wife, the widow of Jonas, and daughter of Budic II of Cornouaille, and then asked the hand of Triphena, daughter of Weroc, Count of the British of Vannes.

Weroc was now aged, and his son Macliau, well aware that on his father's death his brother Canao would endeavour to kill him, entered into negotiations with Conmore, to secure his support. Then it was that the Count of Poher and regent of Domnonia asked for the hand of Triphena.

Count Weroc was reluctant to give his consent. He had gauged the character of the man and mistrusted him.

Thereupon Conmore turned to Gildas, and gained his advocacy. The Rhuis biographer gives us the Breton tradition of his time. He says, "Conomerus made it his practice, as soon as he learnt that his wife had conceived, to put her to death at once. And when he had already done away with many women sprung from noble families, parents began to feel much saddened on this account, and to move further away from him."¹

This is mere idle legend. History has recorded only one previous wife, and with her Conmore lived happily.²

Gildas had not seen through the design of Conmore; his vanity was flattered by being asked to further the suit of the Count, and he persuaded Weroc against his better judgment to give his daughter to the regent.

As far as can be made out Conmore treated the lady with brutality and murdered her son Trechmor, probably by a former husband, killing him at Carhaix. Thereupon Triphena fled from her husband and threw herself on the protection of her father.

The whole story has been so transformed by fable, that it is difficult to arrive at the facts.

Gildas heard of what had taken place whilst at Castennec, and he rushed off, crossed the Blavet and went to Camors, where was Conmore's castle, and taking a handful of earth, cast it against the wall, and cursed it and doubtless its master with it.³ Then he hastened on to Weroc and found the runaway wife with him. He arranged that so soon as she gave birth to the child she bore in her womb, she should be received into a religious house for women, and that the child should be given to him. When this event took place, he himself baptized the child, a boy, gave to it his own name, and undertook to train it for the monastic profession.

¹ Vita 1^{ma}, p. 354. ² De la Borderie, Hist. de Bretagne, i, p. 401, note 1.

³ "Accipit plenum pugillum terræ et projecit super illam habitationem, quæ statim Deo volente tota corruiit." Vita 1^{ma}, p. 360.

This is not the form in which the legend is told by the Rhuis biographer.

According to him, both Gildas and Weroc knew the character of Conmore, and both were reluctant to allow the marriage. But Conmore insisted, and Weroc in a fright sent for Gildas, who then yielded, and promised that if Weroc would give his daughter to the Regent of Domnonia he himself would be responsible for her safety. When, after the marriage, Conmore perceived that Triphena was about to become a mother "he meditated killing her as had been his custom." She, fearing for her life, ran away. "When her wicked husband learnt this, he was incensed with greater anger, and pursued her. Having found her on the road-side, hiding under some leaves—for she was wearied by her journey—he drew out his sword, cut off her head, and then returned home."¹

Hearing of what had taken place, Gildas went to the place "where lay the lifeless corpse of the murdered woman with her offspring in her womb . . . prayed, and then took the head and fastened it on to the trunk of the body . . . and forthwith she arose whole."²

When the son was born, Gildas had the child baptized, and this "son also was distinguished for his virtues and miracles, and completed with a blessed end the saintly life he had led. Now the Bretons, in order to distinguish him from the other S. Gildas, do not call him Gildas but Trechmorus."

The Rhuis biographer does not relate the martyrdom of this Trechmor by his father. Such, however, is the constant tradition.³

The whole story is impossible as well as absurd. If Conmore did kill a child of Triphena, it must have been a son by a former husband, as his fall ensued very shortly after the flight of Triphena.

If Triphena had a son named Gildas, he disappears totally from Breton history, and it is possible that he may have gone from distracted Brittany to Glastonbury, settled and died there, and thus may have given occasion to the mistake into which the author of the Second Life has fallen, in making the historian to be buried at Glastonbury.

Trechmor is said to have suffered decapitation at Carhaix, the residence of Conmore. He is the patron of the place, and is represented at the west end of the church, above the principal doorway, as a young man of about twenty-one, holding his head in his hands.

¹ Ibid., p. 358.

² Ibid., p. 360.

³ Acta Sti. Trechmori, Bibl. Nat. Français MS. 22321, p. 870; and Ancient Breviary of Quimper. Lobineau, Vies des SS. de Bretagne, ed. 1836, pp. 298-300; Garaby, p. 300.

Trechmor cannot have been identical with the younger Gildas, but was a distinct personage, older than the godson of Gildas by many years. The younger Gildas was born about 550, and Conmore was killed in 555, so that he cannot have put his son by Triphena to death as a young man. The only explanation of the story that can be adopted is that Conmore married Triphena, who was a widow with a grown-up son, Trechmor, and that Conmore, finding Trechmor stand in his way, as he had Judual, sought his life and succeeded in killing him, whereas he had failed in the case of Judual.

Count Weroc died shortly after the return of his daughter (550); whereupon Canao, the Conober of Gregory of Tours, murdered three of his brothers, and Macliau fled to Conmore, but after a while stole back, threw himself into Vannes, and got himself elected bishop.

Meanwhile, Conmore had got embroiled with the saints of Léon and Domnonia. A conjuration against the Regent was the result, and we may be sure that Gildas, flaming with mortified vanity and resentment, threw himself into it, heart and soul.

Conmore fell in a battle fought on the slopes of the Monts d'Arrée in 555. An Abbey du Relecq (of the Bones) was erected on the site by Judual and S. Paul of Léon.

Gildas unquestionably had taken an energetic part in the conjuration against Conmore, and he expected to be rewarded, as were the other saints who had excommunicated and cursed the Regent from the top of Menes Bré. Nor was he disappointed. We may attribute to this period the foundations in Domnonia.

He made a settlement at Laniscat near Corlay and Quintin. "Here," says De la Borderie, "not only is Gildas the patron of the parish, and the church covered with paintings representing his history, but in the commune are likewise a chapel dedicated to him, and a cave, of which tradition tells, that he was wont to retire to it, after having preached throughout the neighbourhood; and there he was wont to sleep on a stone shaped like a bed, which is still to be seen in the cave, and to which processions were made in his honour, to the end of the seventeenth century."¹ In this region we have La Harmoye, of which Gildas is patron, as also Magoar; and at Plaintel his son Cenydd was installed.

His monasteries of Rhuis, Castennec and Locminé possessed that indispensable adjunct to a monastic institution, a barren island to which the abbot and the more devout might retreat for perfect solitude; not so his Domnonian colony. He accordingly sought one out. Striking due north, he halted at Tonquedec, and was there sufficiently long to leave a lasting impress. It was a halfway house. His chapel is there, with his story represented in a series of panels. But his object was the sea, the tossing "wine-dark" sea, and he pushed on to Port Blanc, on the north coast, a little west of Tréguier. Port Blanc is known to us as the place whence sailed the Breton auxiliaries of Henry Bolingbroke.¹ The coast is rugged, and the sea is thick strewn with an archipelago of islets. The largest isle is that of S. Gildas; that he coveted, asked for and was given, and it now bears his name. Granite rocks start abruptly out of the green sward, and on the side towards the mainland, away from the sea-gales, timber grows. Here is a dolmen that is called the Bed of Gildas, and a chapel marks the site of his oratory.

¹ Hist. de Bretagne, i, p. 439.

Affairs in Broweroc were not to his mind. Canao, who had murdered his brothers, gave shelter to Chramm, son of Clothair, King of Soissons. Chramm had rebelled against his father, and having lost his uncle and ally, Childebert, in 558, fled from the resentment of his father for shelter in Broweroc.

Canao took up arms on his behalf, assumed the offensive, invaded the Franco-Gallic marches, and committed great ravages. Clothair raised a large army and met the Bretons. An engagement ensued, and Canao was defeated and slain, 560.

Chramm fled, was about to take boat and leave the land, when he remembered that his wife and daughters were in a fisherman's cabin on the shore. He returned to fetch them away and was captured. By his father's orders he was strangled with a kerchief, and fire was heaped round the hut, and the poor women within were burned to death.

Where was Gildas all this while? These horrors cannot have been enacted far from Vannes. We do not hear that he issued from his secure monastery to lift a voice to protest against such deeds of barbarism.

No sooner was Canao dead, than Macliau, who had been Bishop of Vannes, assumed the temporal Countship along with the spiritual rule over Broweroc, and recalled his wife and children.

Macliau had entered into a solemn contract with Budic II of Cornouaille to guarantee the safety of their respective children.

No sooner was Budic dead, circa 570, than Macliau broke his oath, invaded Cornouaille, and wrested it from Tewdrig, son of Budic. The young prince concealed himself, collected followers, and awaited his opportunity. Macliau had been excommunicated by the other bishops, but that concerned him not. In 577 Tewdrig emerged from his concealment, fell unawares on Macliau, and slew him and one of his sons who was with him.

¹ Richard II, Act ii, sc. 1.

The spiritual condition of Broweroc at the period whilst Macliau was bishop must have been in a most unsatisfactory condition; there were but Gildas and his monks in the diocese to hold aloft the lamp of religion.

It is certainly surprising that not a word of reproach spoken against these perfidious princes and their renegade bishop should have been recorded as having been spoken, not a line of condemnation has come down to us, not even the notice that Gildas put pen to paper to rebuke them. But they were near at hand to avenge an insult, and with Gildas discretion was the better part of valour. He could pour forth scurrility and abuse on princes too far away to touch his skin, but he was silent before those who could injure him or his monasteries.

Before 549 Finnian of Clonard, whom Gildas had met in Wales, was in correspondence with him relative to a penitential code; and Gildas had kept up his interest in Ireland.

King Ainmire, 565, invited him over to restore religion in Erin,¹ and the revival that actually took place has been attributed to him in concert with Cadoc and David. David himself did not visit the island, but he trained men to act there as evangelists. Cadoc and Gildas, however, worked there in person. The Rhuis biographer has bungled sadly over this second visit to Ireland, made when Gildas was very old. He confounds it with the early visit, from which he was recalled by the murder of his brother Huail, and from which it was separated by something like fifty years. The date of this visit to Ireland can be fixed with some certainty. Ainmire became supreme King only in 564, and the Annales Cambriæ give 565 as the date of the Navigation of Gildas into Ireland.

The lapse of the Irish from their first faith has been hotly contested,² and yet it is exceedingly probable. It would be but in accordance with human nature that there should have been a reaction, and it agrees with the experience of missionaries in all ages. The rapid conversion of the Irish had been superficial, a relapse was inevitable.

¹ "Eo tempore regnabat Ainmericus rex per totam Hiberniam, qui et ipse misit ad beatum Gildam rogans, ut ad se veniret," etc. Vita 1^{ma}, pp. 338-40. The date of Ainmire's death is uncertain. The Annals of Ulster give 568 and 575; the Chron. Scott. 569; Inisfallen 561; Four Masters 566.

² Zimmer, Celtic Church in Britain and Ireland, London, 1902.

S. Patrick's policy had been that of gaining the outward adherence of the adult members of a clan, tolerating old superstitions, and reserving to himself to carry the true principles of the faith into the hearts, and to mould the minds of the people. "Adhesion to Christianity, which was in a great measure only the attachment of a clan to its chieftain, and in which Pagan usages, under a Christian name, were of necessity tolerated, could not, in the nature of things, be very lasting."¹

Ainmire desired Gildas to remain in Ireland. He declined to do this, but "he went about all the territories of the Hibernians, and restored the churches, instructed the whole body of the clergy in the Catholic Faith, that they might worship the Holy Trinity . . . and drove away from them heretical conceits with their authors."² This is the exaggeration of a biographer who wrote several centuries later. He did something, no doubt, but not much. He built monasteries, and furnished the churches with a form of Mass as said at Rhuis.³

But, whatever success he gained in Ireland, his visit there must have been sad. S. Brigid, to whom he had given a bell, was dead; so was his friend Finnian of Clonard. He himself was old and weary, and he did not remain long in Ireland. He returned to Armorica, feeling that his end was approaching, and he departed from the monastery of Rhuis to die in peace in the island of Houat.

The Rhuis biographer gives a lengthy harangue addressed by Gildas from his death-bed to the monks, but as the writer lived something like seven centuries later, he doubtless excogitated it himself. The last request made by Gildas was that his body might be placed in a boat and committed to the waves. It perhaps shows a lingering in his mind of the pagan idea of shipping the dead to the Isles of the Blessed beneath the setting sun.

His wish was complied with, but the people from Cornugallia, in their greed for relics, pursued it in boats. However, before they could reach the drifting coracle, a wave upset it; and the body sank.⁴

Three months later, a corpse was washed ashore on the sands of the little bay of Crouesty by Arzon, which may or may not have been that of the Saint. After three months' immersion and knocking against the cliffs and among the reefs, it must have been totally

¹ Dr. Todd, S. Patrick, 1864, p. 503.

² Vita 1^{ma}, p. 342.

³ "Hii ritum celebrandi Missam acceperunt a sanctis viris de Britannia, scilicet a Sancto David et Sancto Gilda et Sancto Doco." De Tribus Ordinibus SS. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, etc., ii, p. 293; Acta SS. Hib. in Cod. Sal., col. 162.

⁴ "Sed hi qui de Cornugallia venerant, qui plures erant, conabantur eum tollere et in patriam suam transferre." Vita 1^{ma}, p. 368.

unrecognizable, if it were that of Gildas. And be it remembered, that he died in January, and this body was not found till May, so that it had been exposed to winter and spring storms. However, the monks of Rhuis were easily satisfied; they assumed that this was the corpse of their late abbot, and they conveyed it to their church and buried it there.

Gildas died on January 29, and the body that passed as his was found on May 11.

The Annales Cambriæ give as the date of his death, 570, so do those of Tighernach. Those of Ulster give 569, but as these Annals are a year in arrear through the early portion, this gives the same date. The Annals of Inisfallen give 567.

The Rhuis author does not give us the date, nor the age of Gildas when he died. He merely says that he was "senex et plenus dierum."¹ If our calculation be correct, he was aged 94 years. In Brittany, relying on the entry in the Chronicon Britannicum, that he was born in 490, it is assumed that his age when he died was 80.

The points given in the Life by the Monk of Rhuis are these:—Gildas was aged 30 when he arrived first in Houat over against Rhuis: "Sanctus igitur Gildas triginta habens annos venit ad quamdam insulam, quæ in Reuvisii pagi prospectu sita est."

The date given in the Chronicon Britannicum is 520.

He remained seven years in Armorica and then returned to Britain:—"Transfretavit mare Gallicum, et civitatibus Galliæ remansit studens optime spatio vii annorum et in termino septimi anni cum magna mole diversorum voluminum remeavit ad majorem Britanniam." This we get from the Second Life, attributed to Caradog of Llancarfan. The Rhuis biographer did not consider how absurd it was to suppose that Ainmire should have invited over a young man under thirty years of age to renovate Christianity in Ireland. He makes Ainmire, who came to the throne in 565, a contemporary of S. Brigid, who died in 525. What can be more obvious than that he has confounded together the two visits of Gildas to Ireland, the first in 510-2, the second in 565.

We venture to suggest the following chronology of the Life of Gildas, by which the only statement rejected is that of the Rhuis biographer, who says that he was aged thirty when he settled at Rhuis.

Gildas, born in Arecluta, the year of the victory of Ambrosius 476

The sons of Caw take refuge in Gwynedd from the Picts and Scots, and are granted lands in Môn by Cadwallon Lawhir c. 506

¹ Vita 1^{ma}, p. 368.

Gildas loses his wife, and embraces the religious profession under S. Illtyd	c. 507
Gildas leaves S. Illtyd and goes to Ireland, where he makes acquaintance with S. Brigid	c. 510
Gildas recalled from Ireland by the slaying of Huail by Arthur	c. 512
Lands granted in blood fine by Arthur to the family of Caw.
The Battle of Mount Badon. Gildas goes to Rome, and on his way back lands at Rhuis, and obtains a grant of land there	520
Is visited at Rhuis by S. Brendan winter of	523-4
Returns to Britain to obtain recruits. Meets S. Finnian in Pepidiauc, æt. 51	c. 527
Takes charge of Llanrcarfau for a twelvemonth	c. 528-9
Goes to Glastonbury	c. 530
After seven years in Britain he returns to Rhu's, æt. 58	c. 534
Composes De Excidio Britanniaë , ten years after his return to Rhuis	c. 544
Flight of his brother and sons from Wales	c. 545
The Yellow Plague, and death of Maelgwn Gwynedd. Visit of S. Cadoc to Brittany and settlement at Belz	547
Marriage of Conmore with Triphena	c. 549
Conspiracy formed against Conmore	c. 550
Defeat and death of Conmore	c. 555
Grant made of lands in Domnonia to Gildas by Judual	c. 556
Death of Canao, Count of Broweroc	560
Macliau becomes Count as well as Bishop of Vannes. Gildas is summoned to Ireland by Ainmire, æt. 89	565
Gildas returns to Rhuis	c. 567
Death of Gildas, aged ninety-four years.	570

The reason for allowing Gildas seven years in Britain is that the author of the Second Life says that Cadoc and Gildas spent seven years together on the islets in the Severn Sea, Ronech and Echni; but this is only to be understood of the Lent of those years. And this may be an exaggeration of the time spent in Britain.¹

After his return to Rhuis ten years elapsed before he wrote De Excidio.² This cannot have been in 530 after his first arrival, as he speaks of a generation having grown up since peace had come on Britain in consequence of the victory of Mount Badon; it must therefore have been ten years after his return. If he had written in 440, as is generally supposed, that makes twenty years of peace. It is better to allow twenty-four years, and if we do that, then we find the seven years in Britain collecting disciples accounts for the dates.

¹ "Visitabat unus alterum; remanentia talis duravit spacio vii annorum." Vita 2da, p. 408.

² "Sanctus vir . . . post decem annos, ex quo inde recesserat, scripsit epistolarem libellum in quo quinque reges ipsius insulæ redarguit diversis sceleribus atque criminibus irretitos." Vita 1ma, p. 352. This may be a conclusion drawn from the words of Gildas: "Silui, fateor, cum immenso cordis dolore . . . spatio bilustri temporis vel eo amplius." Præfat., ed. Williams, p. 2.

One curious and bewildering divergence in the two Lives of Gildas may perhaps be reconciled. The Rhuis biographer says that Gildas died in Houat off the coast of Rhuis, and he is certainly correct. But Caradog of Llancarfan, or whoever wrote the Life of Gildas that we call Vita Secunda, says that he died and was buried at Glastonbury.

Now Gildas may have resided awhile, and probably did so, at Glastonbury. But he returned to Rhuis. There he became foster-father of a child of Triphena and Conmore, who was called after him, Gildas. It is by no means improbable that this younger Gildas may have gone to Britain and settled at Glastonbury. His life would probably not be very safe in Armorica, under the turbulent Canao and the unscrupulous Macliau, and if this younger Gildas did live and die and was buried at Glastonbury, what more probable than that in after ages he should be confounded with his foster-father, who was famous, whilst he himself was obscure?

The day of S. Gildas is January 29. He is commemorated on that day in the Félire of Oengus, and the Martyrology of Tallaght. But in the Martyrologies of O'Gorman and of Donegal on November 4. On January 29 in the Leofric Missal brought from Glastonbury to Exeter: its date is 1050. In the calendar, Cotton MS. Vitell. A. xii, of the twelfth century. In a calendar in Saxon characters of the eleventh century. Cotton MS. Nero, A. ii. In the Altemps Martyrology of the end of the thirteenth century on January 27, as also in the Norwich Martyrology of the fifteenth century. Cotton MS. Julius B. vii. This is based on the Altemps Martyrology.

But on January 29 Whytford has:—"The feest of Saynt Gyld, a holy man;" and Roscarrock gives him on that day as Gildas Albanicus. On the same day in the fifteenth century Missal of S. Méen, and in the Breviaries of Vannes, 1589, 1660, 1757; the S. Brieuc Breviary of 1548, and a MS. Missal (fifteenth century) of S. Melanius, Rennes. But the Breviary of Léon 1736, and a Quimper Breviary of 1835, on February 6.

On May 11 the finding of the body is commemorated in the diocese of Vannes, Missal 1530, Breviary 1589, and is locally observed by a procession to Crouesty from Rhuis.

The only foundation of Gildas in Wales has been already mentioned, Y Wig Fawr, in Glamorganshire, which rests on the doubtful authority of the Iolo MSS. Those in Brittany have been already referred to. In addition to those of his founding are churches at Auray, dedicated to him in the twelfth century, and S. Gildas des Bois, founded in 1026.

A very fine wooden statue of him of the fifteenth century, and thrown into a corner, discarded, is in the chapel of N. D. de Plasquen at Locminé. It represents him with his symbol, a snarling cur, at his side.

A beautiful modern statue at Rhuis standing over the tomb in the apse of the church shows him as a young and amiable monk, with circular tonsure and Benedictine habit. A silver bust in the treasury contains the skull of the corpse washed ashore at Crouesty and accepted as his.

At Plouégat Guerand, near Lanmeur, in Finistère, is his statue on the porch door, 1536.

The Iolo MSS. have among the "Sayings of the Wise" one that is attributed to Gildas—¹

"Hast thou heard the saying of Gildas,
Of the Golden Wood, a man of great dignity?
Fortune never will favour the hateful."
(Ni ryfein ffawd i atgas.)

In the same work occurs a short religious tract entitled The Principles of Prediction of Gildas the Prophet.² It is not of the vehement character of his genuine writings, and might well, as it stands in the original, be of the seventeenth century. In Welsh Gildas is often given the epithet "Prophet."

Among the "seven questions put by Catwg the Wise to seven wise men of his choir at Llanfeithin, and their answers," is the following:—"Who is the richest man?" to which Gildas of the Golden Wood replies:—"He who covets naught that belongs to another."³

The Penitential of Gildas and fragments of lost letters are published by Mommsen in Pertz, Mon. Germ. Hist., Chronica Minora, iii. pp. 86-90; and by Prof. Williams in his Gildas, pp. 256-85. His Lorica by Prof. Williams in the same, pp. 304-13; also in the Liber Hymnorum, Henry Bradshaw Society, i. pp. 206-10, and Zimmer, Nennius Vindicatus, 1893, pp. 337-40. This Lorica would seem to have been composed in 547, when in a panic lest the Yellow Plague should extend its ravages to Armorica.

"Suffragare, quæso, mihi possito
Magni maris velut in periculo,
Ut non secum trahat me mortalitas
Hujus anni, neque mundi vanitas."

In deadly fear for himself, he invokes apostles, prophets, martyrs,

¹ P. 252. The "saying" differs in the "Stanzas of the Hearing," Myv. Arch., p. 129. It occurs also in the form, "Ffawd i ddiriaid ni ryfain."

² Iolo MSS., pp. 195-6.

³ Myv. Arch., p. 776. Needless to say, these questions and answers are of very late date.

S. GILDAS.

From 15th century Statue at Locminé.

virgins, confessors, angels of all degrees, as well as the Almighty, to protect him.

“Skull, head, hair and eyes,
 Forehead, tongue, teeth and their covering (the lips),
 Neck, breast, side, bowels,
 Waist, buttocks and both hands,
 For the crown of my head with its hair,
 Be thou the helmet of salvation on the head ;
 For forehead, eyes, triform brain,
 Nose, lip, face, temple,
 For chin, beard, eyebrows, ears,
 Cheeks, lower cheeks, internasal, nostrils,
 For the pupils, irides, eyelashes, eyelids,
 Chin, breathing, cheeks, jaws,
 For teeth, tongue, mouth, throat,
 Uvula, windpipe, root of tongue, nape,
 For the middle of the head, for cartilage, Neck—thou kind One, be near for defence,” and so on, no part of the body is forgotten.

This extraordinary prayer was taken to Ireland, and tradition attached to it that to any man who should repeat it frequently, seven additional years would be added to his life, and a third portion of his sins would be blotted out. Nor would the man die on the day that he repeated it.

The Lorica of Gildas belongs to a class of compositions that were little better than magical charms ; of which the Deer's Cry of S. Patrick is another example, as is also the hymn Sen Dé by S. Colman mac Ui Cluasaig, composed on account of the pestilence in 697. For a critical consideration of the Lorica and of the question whether it were composed by Gildas, see Professor Williams' Gildas, pp. 289-303.

The fragments of letters of Gildas give us a higher opinion of him than do his hateful Increpatio or his absurd Lorica. In them are words full of real charity and liberality. In one he argues strongly against narrowness and self-righteousness in those who hold themselves aloof from others who are imperfect and even evil. “Aaron did not cast away the table of the priest of the idols of Midian. Moses also entered into hospitality and peaceful entertainment with Jethro. Our Lord Jesus Christ did not avoid the feasts of publicans, so that He might save all sinners and harlots.”

“Abstinence from animal food without love is profitless. Better, therefore, are they that fast without display, and do not fast excessively from what God has created, but anxiously preserve a clean heart within.” “Many,” says he, “eat bread by measure, but boast thereof beyond measure ; whilst using water, they drink the cup of hate ; they simultaneously enjoy dry dishes and back-biting."

"When a ship is wrecked, who can swim let him swim."

He recommends gentle rebuke of evil doers ! Had he learned by experience that his venomous Increpatio had done much harm and little good ? "Miriam is condemned with leprosy, because she agreed with Aaron in blaming Moses on account of his Ethiopian wife. This we should fear when we disparage good princes on account of moderate faults." "To the wise man truth shines from whatsoever mouth it has issued."

Giraldus Cambrensis has an explanation of the fact that no mention is made of the great deeds of King Arthur in his History. He says : "De Gilda vero qui adeo in gentem suam acriter invehitur, dicunt Britones, quod propter fratrem suum Albaniam principem, quem rex Arthurus occiderat offensus hæc scripsit. Unde et libros egregios quos de Gestis Arthuri et gentis suæ laudibus multos scripserat, audita fratris sui nece omnes, ut asserunt, in mare projecit. Cujus rei causa nihil de tanto principe in scriptis authenticis expressum invenies." ¹

Gildas is commemorated in the Diptychs in the Stowe Missal. ²

S. GISTLIANUS, see S. GWESTLAN

S. GLASSOG

THE Iolo MSS. genealogies give two saints of this name, for whom they are the sole authority.

(1) Glassawg, the son of Coedwallawn, and fifth in descent from Brân Fendigaid, a pedigree as mythical as could well be. It is added that he lies buried in Gwynedd, and that the church dedicated to him is Llanynglassawg. He was the father of Glas, the father of S. Mabon Wyn. ³

(2) Glassawg, the son of Glassar ab Geraint ab Nynnio ab Cyn-ddilig ab Nwython ab Gildas ab Caw. He was bishop at Caer Gybi, or Holyhead, and had a church dedicated to him in Arllechwedd, in the neighbourhood of Bangor. He bestowed lands upon Bangor Deiniol. ⁴

¹ De Illaudabilibus Walliæ, prol.

² Warren, Liturgy of the Celtic Church, p. 240.

³ P. 136. The Glesius mentioned in the boundary of S. Bride's-super-Ely, Glamorganshire (Book of Llan Dâv, p. 263), is now the Glasswg.

⁴ Iolo MSS. pp. 139-40.

One saint only is intended—the pedigrees having been manufactured—and he clearly owes his existence to S. Tegai's entry in the older Bonedds, which in Hafod MS. 16 runs, "Tegai ym Maes Llan Glassog yn Arllechwedd," and in Hanesyn Hên (p. 115), "Tygai y Meisyn Glassog." Llandegai is meant.

S. GLYWYS CERNYW, Martyr

GLYWYS CERNYW, or "the Cornishman," was son of Gwynllyw Filwr † ab Glywys ab Tegid ab Cadell Ddyrnllug, by Gwladys, daughter of Brychan Brycheiniog. He was thus a brother of the great S. Catwg, or Cadoc.¹ He is mentioned as "an honoured saint."²

To him is said to have been formerly dedicated the church of Coed Cernyw, "the Cornishman's Wood," now Coedkernew (All Saints), in Monmouthshire. He appears to have died a martyr, for a Merthir Gliuis is mentioned in the Book of Llan Dâu,³ the name of which is believed to be preserved in Clivis, in Newton Nottage, Glamorgan-shire.

The Cornish S. Gluvias, of whom nothing is known, is probably the same as Glywys.

There was a chapel in the valley of Lanherne, and the farm by it is called Gluvian, which seems to point out that the chapel bore the same dedication as the parish church of Gluvias.

In Domesday, however, this latter is called San Guilant, and in the Exeter transcript Sain Guilant. Gluvias is certainly quite out of the region occupied by the Brecknock-Gwentian settlers, but as Glywys belonged to a later generation, and did not probably come into Cornwall till the settlement in the North was a fait accompli, and the excitement and resentment caused by the invasion had somewhat abated, this may explain his church being found on the Fal. The Feast is on the first Sunday in May. He is not commemorated in the Welsh calendars.

A S. Cleuzen is patron of a parish in the diocese of Tréguier near Pontrioux.⁴ He has been displaced to make way for S. Cletus, Pope. Glywys may have become Glewz and then Cleuzen, with the suffix. But

¹ Peniarth MS. 178; Iolo MSS., p. 130; Myv. Arch., p. 426. The name is Latinized Gluiguis, Gliuisus, etc.

² Peniarth MS. 178, p. 23.

³ Pp. 225, 412.

⁴ Lobineau, Vies des Saints de Bretagne, ed. 1836, i, p. xiv.

† Glywys son of Gwynllyw Guilant of ...

without further evidence nothing can be concluded towards the identification. The cult of S. Cadoc, brother of Glywys, is, however, in force in the parish, where he has a chapel.

Glywys's grandfather, Glywys ab Tegid, is in one passage in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ said to have founded the church of Machen (now S. Michael), in Monmouthshire. But there is no evidence for his sainthood. This Glywys gave name to the principality of Glywysing, which included approximately the district between the lower courses of the Usk and the Towy, and was not quite conterminous with the Morganwg of later times.² In the preface to the Life of S. Cadoc³ he is stated to have had ten children, among whom Glywysing was apportioned, but Pedrog "gave up a transitory for a perpetual inheritance," and left for Cornwall.

S. GNAWAN, Confessor

A DISCIPLE of S. Cadoc, from Ireland, was so called.⁴ When Cadoc returned from Ireland he brought with him "a large company of Irish and British clerics, among whom were the religious and very learned men, Finian, Macmoil, and Gnauan, said to be the most celebrated and skilful of all the British disciples."

Later on, when Cadoc "saw the wicked acts of his father . . . he sent faithful messengers of his disciples, Finnian, Gnauan, and Elli, that they might convert him from the errors of his malice and wickedness, and dispose him to divine obedience."

Manorowen (B.V.M.), Pembrokeshire, possibly takes its name from Gnauan. It is locally called Manernawan by the old Welsh-speaking inhabitants.⁵ "This is very probably the person meant by the 'Mynach Naomon' (or Nawmon) mentioned in the mythical Red Book Triad No. 11; ⁶ and in Trioedd y Meirch (Peniarth MS. 16). The same element, -nawan, seems to occur in Kilnawan in the parish of Llanboidy."⁷ There is a Kilawen at S. Issell's, near Tenby.

A "Gnouan abbas altaris Catoci," at Llancarfan, occurs among the signatories to a grant in the *Book of Llan Dâv.*⁸ He was contem-

¹ P. 148. In Jesus College MS. 20 he is given a different pedigree.

² Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, p. 208.

³ Cambro-British Saints, p. 22. In the Life of S. Gwynllyw, ibid., p. 145. Glywysing is divided among seven brothers.

⁴ Cambro-British Saints, pp. 36, 85.

⁵ In the parish list in Peniarth MS. 147 (c. 1566) it is Maner nawon.

⁶ Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 301.

⁷ Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, pp. 290-1.

⁸ P. 180.

porary with Bishop Berthwyn, the successor, it would appear, of Oudoceus.

S. GOFOR, Hermit

THE genealogy of this saint is not given, but his name is entered in the Iolo MSS.,¹ with Gwarwg and others, as one of the saints of Gwent, from which we are to infer that he is, or rather was, the patron of the church of Llanover (now S. Bartholomew), in Monmouthshire. His cell there is pointed out; and he is "believed to have been buried under a ponderous tombstone, on which is carved an ancient British cross, laid in the doorway of the church of his name within the front porch. In the grounds at Llanover is the Ffynnon Over and its eight surrounding wells, all flowing different ways, but uniting in a bath."²

His festival, Gwyl Ofor, is given on May 9 in the Iolo MSS. calendar.

So much for Gofor. The old forms of the name Llanover, however, distinctly point to a personal name being involved, which we might write to-day Myfor. Llanover occurs in the *Book of Llan Dâv*³ as Lanmour, and elsewhere under similar forms.⁴ The old forms of the name of Merthyr Mawr, Glamorganshire, which appear in the Book of Llan Dâv as Merthir Mimor, Myuor, Mouor, etc., point to the same name.

S. GOLEU, Virgin

GOLEU was one of the unmarried daughters of Brychan Brycheiniog.

In the Cognatio of Cott. Vesp. A. xiv her name is entered, "Goleu in Lan eschin," and in that of Cott. Domitian i, "Gloyv in Lann heskyn." Peniarth MSS. 131 (fifteenth century) and 75 (sixteenth century) give, "Goleu in Llanhesgyn in Gwent." In the Jesus College

¹ Pp. 144, 549.

² Nicholas, Annals and Antiquities of the Counties and County Families of Wales, London, 1875, ii, p. 782. Others give the number of springs as seven and nine. Tegid wrote some verses to the well, Gwaith, 1859, p. 90. After this well a well in Kensington Gardens was named S. Gover's Well. The late Lady Llanover, in her book, Good Cookery, London, 1867, feigns to have derived her recipes and knowledge of Welsh cookery from the Hermit of S. Gover's Cell, who lived in the eighteenth century "in a house cut out of a rock adjoining the cell and opposite the well of S. Gover."

³ P. 321.

⁴ Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, p. 301.

MS. 20 her name is omitted. In the later genealogies¹ her name usually occurs as Goleuddydd, and the church of which she is patron is said to be in Gwent, but its situation is not known.²

A Goleuddydd is mentioned in the tale of Culhwch and Olwen. She was the daughter of Amlawdd Wledig, and wife of Cilydd ab Celyddon.

S. GONANT, Hermit, Confessor

OTHERWISE called Gomond. He was a hermit at Roche, where the parish church is dedicated to him. The popular tradition is that he was a leper, who lived in the hermitage on a rock, and was daily attended by his daughter, who brought him meat and other necessaries. He had a well cut in the rock whence he drank.

The date at which he lived is unknown.

His feast is on the Sunday before the second Thursday in June.

S. GONERY, Priest, Confessor

GONERI, or Gonnery, was a native of Britain, who migrated to Armorica. What his original British name was is difficult to discover. There was a Gwynoro, son of Cynyr Farfwyn, one of the five saints, who, according to tradition, were born at one birth. There is no further record of Gwynoro in Wales, but he and his brothers are commemorated at Llanpumsaint, Carmarthenshire, and formerly at the now extinct chapel of Pumsaint, in Cynwyl Gaio, in the same county. Whether Gonery be this Gwynoro is impossible to say.

Gonery is rendered Vener in Breton, as is also Gwethenoc, and as is likewise Fingar, in Cornish, Gwinear.

The material for the Life of S. Gonery is not abundant. Albert le Grand has given his story from a MS. Legendarium formerly in the church of Plougrescent, from the Proper of Vannes, and from the ancient Tréguier Breviary.

¹ Peniarth MSS., 178, 187; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 120, 140; Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 425.

² See Cambro-British Saints, p. 607. Hesgyn or hesgen, "a marsh," occurs in a number of place-names; Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, p. 350; Record of Caernarvon, 1838, pp. 103, 200.

In the collection of the Blancs Manteaux Bibl. Nat. Paris, MSS. Franç. 22231, is a copy from the Life in the Legendarium of Tréguier. This has been printed by the Abbé Lucas, in Revue historique de l'Ouest, 1888, and apart, Lafolye, Vannes. It is divided into nine lessons.

The Bollandists endeavoured to obtain a copy of the Life possessed, in the time of Albert le Grand, by the church of Plougrescent, but in vain. "Frustra legendam latinam expectarunt majores nostri, frustra ego ipsam speram hodie," Acta SS. Boll. Jul. T. iv, p. 422.

The Life desired by the Bollandists was in all probability the same that the Abbé Lucas has published from the MS. in the Blancs Manteaux. That publication is not very correct. There are in it several slips that have been pointed out by De la Borderie, in the same Revue hist. de l'Ouest, 1888, pp. 243-57, together with a critique on the document.

The Vita published is certainly later than the twelfth century. It speaks of a seneschal of the château of Rohan, which was not constructed till the twelfth century; and there is reference to the fable of Cynan Meiriadog, as given by Geoffrey of Monmouth. It is very deficient in precise details relative to the family of the saint, and to whence he came and where he landed. One incident, that of his trouble with Alvandus, is expanded to a prodigious length, and is based, as the author tells us, on the gesta, the "gestes" of Alvandus, a romance or popular ballad. As in the case of all such manufactured biographies, where material was scarce, it is stuffed with pious reflections and descriptions. The Abbé Lucas has further published in the same Revue a Breton ballad of S. Gonery, but this is not earlier than the seventeenth century. It is founded on the Vita, but adds one particular, that Gonery was a fellow disciple with S. Tudwal, and that he induced Tudwal to sail with him from Britain to Armorica.¹

Whence this detail was culled, whether from a lection in the church of Plougrescent for the Saint's day, or whether it was due to a conjecture because Plougrescent is near S. Tudwal's church at Tréguier, we cannot tell. No weight can be attached to such a statement. Tudwal landed on the coast of Léon above Brest, and Gonery apparently to the south, in Broweroc (Morbihan).

Gonery was a native of Britain. He left his native land and migrated

¹ "Gant Tual eun hé vanati
Eon manac'h Sant Koneri.

* * *

Kerkent sant Tual a zentaz
Ha gant Koneri a devaz
Gant Koneri ha kalz ous penn
Ouz penn tre-ugent'nu eur vandan."

to Brittany, "ad Minorem Britanniam applicuit." "Gonerius Britannia venit in Armoricam."

He landed somewhere—not specified—in Broweroc, and went up country into the forest of Brecillien to Brenguilli, near Rohan.¹ This place in 1265 was a tref in the vast parish of Noyala.² Probably an ancient road crossed the forest from the Roman town of Sulim, now Castanec, to Corseult, and if so then the settlement of Gonerius was on this highway. The whole of the upper waters of the Blavet seem to have been taken possession of by British Saints.

At the time that Gonerius settled at this place, there lived a rough-tempered chief of the name of Alvandus at Noyala.³ As he was returning from hunting one day he passed the cell⁴ of Gonerius, and saluted him courteously, but the hermit was engaged on his office, and made no response. Alvandus rode on, highly incensed, and muttered threats against a man who had settled on his land without leave, and who had not the good manners to acknowledge his greeting. Some of his servants, hearing this, fell behind, and thrashed Gonerius with their whips and sticks, and beat him with their fists.

The steward of Alvandus, afraid that they might serve the hermit too severely, went back to the cell, and found that he had fallen, and that two of his ribs were broken. He threatened the over-officious domestics, and obliged them to desist from further ill treatment. Then he hastened to his master, and represented to him the condition in which Gonerius lay. Alvandus, who was a good-hearted man, if a little hot-tempered, was greatly concerned, and went himself to the cell and offered to take the battered and suffering hermit home with him, and have him properly attended to there. But Gonerius declined this, and Alvandus then readily gave him the patch of land about his cell to clear and cultivate. After that, he frequently visited the saint and listened respectfully to his instructions. Gonerius had a pleasing exterior.⁵

The story went that one day as Gonerius was celebrating mass for a marriage, the stone altar slab at which he stood snapped with a loud report, but happily the two portions did not fall. The altar slab rested on a single central support, and was long afterwards shown as miraculously stayed up although cracked. After a while Gonerius

¹ "A castro Rohani per spacium duorum millium fere distat."

² Le Mené, Paroisses de Vannes, ii, p. 382.

³ "Alvandus erat sevissimus Christianus, manu atrox in potentes, ferox in mites, in populum depopulatus."

⁴ "In hoc loco sibi casam edificans quæ casa usque in hodiernum diem in ecclesiam est conversa."

⁵ "Corpore magnus, membris robustus, vultu plaudus, risu jucundus."

quitted the forest of Brenguilli, and made his way to the north coast at Plougrescent, near Tréguier, and there he died and was buried.

The parish church at Plougrescent has been rebuilt, but the most interesting chapel of S. Gonery remains. It possesses a superb fifteenth century painted ceiling. At the west end, under the tower, on one side is what is supposed to have been the stone boat in which Gonery crossed over to Brittany. It is an ancient, very rude sarcophagus. On the further side of the chapel is his tomb. The peasants creep into it, and take out a little dust which is tied up in a rag, and conveyed to those sick with fever, and it is supposed to heal them. Then these little parcels are returned to the church.

At the east end of the chancel are two statues, one of S. Gonery habited as a priest, in chasuble, with arms extended, and with a wreath of roses on his head. The other statue represents his mother, who is traditionally held to have crossed over with him. She is habited as a queen, as she was of royal descent. The local tradition is that her name was Elebouban, and she is so named in the Breton ballad of S. Gonery. Garaby gives as her day May 23.

Not only is the "holy soil" employed as a febrifuge, but also the "water of S. Gonery." The priest blesses water into which the relics of the saint have been dipped, according to a form that has received episcopal approval.

S. Gonery is invoked by the sailors of the coast, who have great confidence in his protection. They argue that if he crossed the Channel safely in a stone boat, he can assuredly secure their safety in a vessel of wood.

Albert le Grand gives this saint on April 4. The Bishop of Tréguier in 1514 ordered that his feast should be celebrated on the first Tuesday in April, but in 1770 it was transferred to April 7 (Brev. Trecor. 1770; Brev. Corisop. 1783).

But the Breviary of Quimper of 1589, on July 19; and in the MS. Tréguier Legendarium of the fifteenth century on July 18, as also in the various Breviaries, 1630, 1652, 1660.

According to the Acts of the saint he died on July 18. The Pardon at Plougrescent is on the fourth Sunday in July.

S. Gonery is patron of the parish that bears his name near Pontivy, also of Plougrescent, and of S. Connec, near S. Gonery. He has chapels at Hémoustoir, Langoat, Lanvellec, Locarn, Ploezal, and Plougras.

At the latter is a statue of the saint bare-headed and long-robed, over which is cast a mantle. His right hand holds a staff, his left an open book.

S. Elebouban, his mother, receives a still vigorous cult, especially in the islet of Loaven, off Plougrescent, where are the ruins of an ancient chapel that was dedicated to her. Around it are remains of dwellings, and among them traces of a village oven; and to the chapel is attached an ancient disused cemetery. In the gable of the chapel is a niche that contains the statue of the holy woman, behind folding shutters. She is represented crowned and holding a book.

A procession is made to this chapel on the Monday in Rogation Week, carrying the head of S. Gonery. If the weather be stormy and the passage dangerous, the pilgrimage is postponed to the following Thursday. On reaching the isle, a hymn of Holy Matrons is sung, and then come special prayers. Women visit the isle from the beginning of summer, taking their little children with them, to invoke the aid of S. Elebouban to make them strong on their legs.¹

S. GORFYW, see S. GWRFYW

S. GOUEZNOU, see S. GWYDDNO

S. GOULVEN, Bishop, Confessor

ALTHOUGH this saint was not born in Britain, his parents emigrated from our island, and he was born shortly after their arrival in Léon. It is accordingly permissible to include him in this work.

The Life is found in a copy made of the ancient Vita by Breton Benedictines in the seventeenth century, and is contained in the twenty-eighth volume of the collection of the Blancs Manteaux now in the Bibliothèque Nationale, MS. Français 22321; from which it was printed by A. de la Borderie in Mémoires de la Soc. d'Emulation des Côtes du Nord, T. xxix., and published separately, Rennes, 1892.

Another, by Albert le Grand, in his Vies des Saints de Bretagne, was derived from MSS. in the Cathedral archives of Léon, and the ancient Breviaries of Quimper, and the Proprium Sanctorum of Rennes. This was, however, founded on the Life published by De la Borderie.

A Vita is also given in the Acta SS. Boll. Jul., I, pp. 127-9, derived from one printed in Gonon; Vitæ Patrum Occidentis, Lyons, 1625, lib. ii, p. 85. The Life first mentioned served as the basis of the Lectons in the Breviary and of the other Lives, and is the only one that need concern us. It is not ancient, as it was composed after 1186; for it contains an account of a miracle then performed. There are other indications to the same effect which have been pointed out by M. de la Borderie.

¹ Garaby, Vies des Saints de Bretagne, 1839, pp. 457-8.

The author was almost certainly a native of Goulven in Léon, as he exhibits acquaintance with the localities to a remarkable degree. He was an honest writer; for he says that he can relate nothing particular of what Goulven did as Bishop, because he could find no written records, or any relation of what he then did that was worthy of confidence, "Quia ad nos nec scripto authentico nec recta relatione per venit."

Owing to a mention in the Life of relations between Goulven and Count Even, and the repulse of Danes and Northmen, Dom Lobineau supposed that the saint lived in the tenth century. But it is possible enough that there was an earlier Even, who gave his name to Lesneven (Aula Eveni); and the author may have mistaken earlier pirates for those who created such devastation in the tenth century.

That Goulven was in relation with S. Paul of Léon, and succeeded him, can scarcely be doubted.

Glaudan, a native of Britain, left his country along with his wife, Gologwen, who was expecting shortly to become a mother. They arrived in Letavia, and their boat entered what is now the Anse de Goulven, a broad shallow bay, left dry at low tide, and sheltered from the rolling billows by a sandy spur on which now stands the village of Plounéour-Trez.¹ They found the country covered with dense forest. Glaudan arrived only just in time, for his wife was taken with the pangs of maternity. He brought her ashore, as the evening fell, and then hastened in quest of shelter for her head. There was a colonist settled there, but when asked to receive the poor woman, he churlishly refused. Glaudan conducted Gologwen to a place on high ground called Odena, and which still bears the name Maner an Odéna, where she gave birth to a man-child. There was no spring near, but a rustic living in a cottage hard by gave Glaudan a pail (cadum), in which he might bring water from the nearest source, and he pointed out to Glaudan the path that led to the spring.

Glaudan set the pail on his shoulder and went in quest of water, but the night was falling, the track lay among dense bushes, and was much overgrown, and he lost his way. Finally, he got back to his wife, but without water. Discouraged and distressed, he prayed to God, and thereupon a spring gushed forth, and he was able with the limpid water thus miraculously provided, to furnish his wife with the water she required. The spring, which is seven minutes walk from Odéna, still flows, and bears to this day the name of the Fontaine de S. Goulven.

¹ "Glaudanus, relictis Britonibus transmarinis inter quos oriundus extiterat, mare transito, venit in partes Letaniæ, quæ est pars Armoricæ sive Britannicæ minoris, cum Gologuena uxore sua prægnante." For Letania should be read Letavia, and Letavia was not a part of Armorica; it included the whole. The name Goulven is probably the same as the Guollguinn of the Book of Llan Dâu (index, p. 402).

Putting aside the miraculous element in the story, we see that this actually was the spring to which the rustic had directed Glaudan with his pail. The Life goes on to say that considering the sacredness of the spring, and that the water ought not to be employed for common purposes, they dug in another spot and found another source. This probably means that this was done very much later; or else that the rustic demurred to Glaudan employing the spring daily, and forced him to sink a well for himself. Both springs are shown in the hamlet of Kerouchen, or Kerouchic, west of the village of S. Goulven. "The holy-well is surrounded by a wall of cut stones. The other, the profane spring, is eight feet distant outside the enclosure."¹

There was a colonist named Gothian,² rich and fearing God, who lived hard by at Ker-Gozian on a height now called le Vieux Châtel, about seven minutes walk from the Holy Well. Hearing of the arrival of the colonists, and of the distress in which they were, he at once took care that they should be supplied with the necessaries of life. He, moreover, stood godfather to the child, and as he was himself without issue, he adopted the boy, to whom the name of Goulven was given. He sent him to school, where we are not informed, and the little fellow being bright, made great progress with his studies.

That Glaudan and Gologwen were of good family, and that they had already kindred in the country, is probable. On their death they were buried with their kin, "parentibus ejus defunctis et ad patres suos appositis," and Goulven embraced the monastic life, contrary to the wishes of his foster-father Gothian, who had designed him as his successor. Goulven did not go far away; he selected a spot near where he had been born, still called Le Desert, but which was overgrown with brambles. Here he erected a cabin as his peniti, and allowed no woman to approach it, and he erected a chapel or oratory at Odéna, where he had first seen the light.

Goulven left his cabin only once a day, and then he walked

¹ Kerdanet, in his edition of Albert le Grand, 1837, pp. 368-9.

² "Godianus, vir dives ac timens Deum de cujus nomine usque ad hodiernum diem Villa Godiani vocata est." It has lost the name now, but it was called Kergozian as late as 1497. Kerdanet, ibid., p. 369.

round his little domain, his miniti, and planted three crosses at intervals, which bore long the name of the Stations of S. Goulven. As a companion he had a disciple named Maden. Many came to the saint for instruction, for healing, and some took refuge within his sanctuary, which he surrounded with a ditch and mound.

One day a peasant named Joncor, in Plounéour-Trez, found a mass of gold when ploughing, probably some prehistoric torques, and sending for Maden, bade him take the treasure to his master. Goulven received the gold and made of it three bells, one he gave to his own church, and one to that of Lesneven; the third he reserved, and it finally came to Rennes. He also made of the gold a chalice and three crosses.¹

At this period there ruled in Léon a chieftain named Ewen, or John, who had his Lis or Court at Lesneven (Lis-an-Even). A band of Saxon pirates landed on the coast and began to ravage Léon. Ewen sought the saint, desired his prayers, and then fell on the marauders and drove them to the coast and cut them to pieces.²

The biographer has confounded this Ewen with another who lived in the tenth century, and the pirates he also supposes to have been Northmen. There is no reason to doubt that there was a chief of the not uncommon name of John, who immediately succeeded Withur, and who gave his name to Lesneven.

From the Life of S. Melor we know that there had been inroads of the Saxons, who are there called Frixones, about this period.³

Goulven was on intimate terms with Paulus Aurelianus, the Bishop of Léon, and on the death of that saint was chosen to succeed him. But he was wholly unfitted for the office, having spent his days in solitude, and after a very brief episcopate, he fled from his charge into the country of the Reddones, and settled at S. Didier, a commune of Châteaubourg in Ille et Vilaine. "In this parish are preserved reminiscences of S. Goulven, Bishop of Léon, who retired there into solitude and died as a hermit, about the year 600. . . . To this day a wood near the ancient manor of Motte-Mérial bears the name of the Bois de S. Goulven ; the ditches are shown, not now very deep, which enclosed what is called the Garden of S. Goulven ; there stood an old cross lately replaced by one of granite. Finally, on the fringe of the wood, in the field des Brousses, are an old well and the oven of S. Goulven. The hovel occupied formerly by the pious hermit must, accordingly, have been alongside of these ruins, but the site is no longer pointed out. Nor is there any traditional record as to where stood a chapel on this spot. However, annually the parish of S. Didier assembles at the foot of the above-mentioned cross and celebrates on July 6 the feast of S. Goulven, who sanctified this wood." ¹

¹ In the legend, Goulven sends Maden to Joncor to ask him to give him something. Joncor is ploughing, and he takes up handfuls of earth and puts them into Maden's lap to take to his master. As he carries them, the earth is transformed into gold.

² "Temporibus illis, insulani piratæ Daci et Normani . . . Multas provincias et maxime Britanniam nostram Armoricam infestabant cum igitur quadam vice, navigio adducti, Letaniam (? Letaviam) quæ nunc est Leonia—in manu valida intravissent . . . comes Evenus qui cognominatus est Magnus, cujus sedes erat in oppido quod ab ejus nomine Lesnevenum, quasi Aula Eveni, usque in diem dicitur hodiernum, collectis militibus et peditibus Christianis, prædictis paganis congredi affectabat," p. 220.

³ "Is (Jan Reith) post desolationem Frixonum et Corsoldi ducis nostram adiens desertam Cornugalliam," etc. Vita S. Melori in Anal. Boll., T.V. (1886), p. 166. This was at an earlier period, but these raids probably continued for over a century. The second Count Even made a grant to the monastery of S. Winvaloe in 955. Cart. Landevennec, ed. De la Borderie, p. 163.

The Life of S. Goulven was drawn up late, in the twelfth century, and contains some anachronisms, as the introduction of "Count" Even, who lived in the tenth century. But in its broad outlines it may be trusted, as founded on fairly trustworthy tradition. The blunders have been pointed out by De la Borderie.

Paul of Léon died about 570. We may suspect that Goulven was a kinsman, or else he was hardly likely to have been chosen to replace him. The holding of the headship of a monastery in the hands of a kinsman, one of the same blood, had not died out in Brittany at so early a period.

"The communities were composed of actual or reputed relations, all related, in a very near degree, by a real descent from a common ancestor, that is, the heads of the different households which made up the community, whether tribe, village, or family, were all closely related to each other. If a man did not come within the prescribed limit of relationship he did not belong to the community, but was a stranger ; and, as a stranger, he was primâ facie an enemy, and therefore a person to be knocked on the head at the earliest possible opportunity." ²

This was true largely of the religious communities. Strangers and refugees were received into the sacred tribe of the saint, but had no right to succession to the headship of the community. That must go to one of the blood-relations of the saint. It is consequently not credible that Goulven could have been chosen to be bishop and abbot unless he belonged to the family of Paul by blood relationship.

In the Life published by De la Borderie, Goulven is said to have died in the year 500. Early Lives never give the date of the year, solely of the month.

¹ De Corson, Pouillé Hist. de l'Archevêché de Rennes, iii, pp. 717-8.

² Willis Bund, The Celtic Church of Wales, London, 1897, p. 55.

Paul of Léon survived the elevation of Judual to the throne of Domnonia but a few years, and can hardly have died later than 570. We may place the accession of Goulven to the episcopal throne then. That he remained long bishop is improbable, as nothing is recorded of his episcopal acts, and he was immediately followed by Tenenan.

Goulven is patron of the parish that bears his name. A holy well a little way out of the village has an enclosed space and tank before it; and on one side a stone bath in which the infirm were placed and water from the well poured over them. But the practice has been abandoned within the memory of man. He is also patron of Goulien, near Pontcroix, in Finistère; he has chapels as well at Caurel, Lanvellec near Plouaret in Côtes du Nord, and at Henvic. He is second patron of S. Didier in Ille et Vilaine, where he died; also of Locmaria-Plouzané and Plouëzoch. His day is July 1 in the MS. Missal of Tréguier of the fifteenth century, in the Breviary of Dol, 1519, and in Albert le Grand. But July 7 in the Léon Breviary of 1736. And July 8 in the Quimper Breviary of 1835, and in the Breviary of Rennes of 1627. At Goulven his fête is on July 1, and this is his day in Roscarrock's Calendar. There is a statue of him as a bishop at Goulven, and one above his holy well, as a Bishop without any distinguishing attribute.

He is invoked against fever and for maladies to cattle.

There is a chapel bearing his name, under the form of Gelvin, in S. Sithney parish, Cornwall. (Register of B. Stafford, 1398, p. 225).

S. GOVAN, Abbot, Confessor

THERE is a chapel of S. Govan, or, as now called, S. Gowan, on the south coast of Pembrokeshire, and the saint has given his name to the bold headland of contorted rock that shoots 160 feet above the sea. The head is traversed by a fissure, narrow and deep, between limestone crags, and accessible by a flight of rude steps. The chapel is built across the chasm, and is of a very early and rude character.

There can be little doubt as to who this Govan was, i.e., Gobhan, the disciple of S. Ailbe, known as S. Ailfyw, or Elfyw, in Welsh. The name is common in the Irish Martyrologies, and it is difficult always to distinguish the saints of that name one from another. The name means "a smith," whence Gobannium (Abergavenny), "a smithy."

Gobhan, also called Mogopoc, was S. Ailbe's cook. Gobhan was of the clan of the Hy Cinnselach. As the Saintly Master desired to have a correct form of the order of the Mass, he sent his disciples Lugich and Cailcenn to Rome, and his cook along with them.

As they were about to start, the three said to Ailbe, "Promise us that we shall all return safe and sound to Ireland." "I promise it," answered Ailbe.

On board ship Gobhan was so sea-sick that he thought he must die, and the rest really believed his end was at hand. What to do without their cook they did not know, and they thought, moreover, that the promise of Ailbe would fail. From exhaustion Gobhan fell into fits of fainting and utter prostration. But after a while he rallied, and said to his fellow travellers: "You have been guzzling on this voyage, and not fasting, as was seemly, and that upset me."¹

Gobhan afterwards, having returned from Rome, became Abbot of Dairinis in his native country of the Hy Cinnselach, or Wexford.

There was a Gobhan—possibly the same—who was for a while disciple of S. Senan of Iniscathy, and he is said to have been brother of S. Setna. Ailbe died 527-31,² and Gobhan may have gone to Senan after his death.

But he is certainly to be distinguished from a namesake, "the father of a thousand monks," who settled in Ulster, although Colgan supposed there might be identity.

According to local tradition, S. Govan spent his last years in retreat on the headland in Pembrokeshire that bears his name. Within his chapel there is a "wishing place," a fissure in the rock just large enough to hold one person. Whoever, seated in it, forms his wish, with full confidence in the merits of S. Govan, and turns himself about each time that he repeats it, is certain to have his desire accomplished. Tradition has it that S. Govan concealed himself in this recess from pirates, and the rock closed about him, and, when they were gone, opened to allow his exit.

A little below the chapel is his Holy Well, covered by a rude roof, now almost dry, whither patients were wont to repair to drink of the miraculous water. But the healing influence of the saint's merits attaches as well to a deposit of red clay lodged in an angle of the cliff, due to decomposition of the rock. "The lame and blind pilgrims are still conveyed by their friends down the rude steps chiselled by the holy man, and, after being anointed with a poultice formed of the moist clay, are left there for several hours to bask under the summer's sun."

¹ Vita S^{ti}. Albei in Salam. Cod., col. 255. In the original Gobhan actually dies, but revives and rebukes the others for eating and not fasting.

² Chron. Scottorum gives the later date. See under S. AILBE, i, p. 135.

The chapel is of the simplest form, consisting of a nave 20 feet by 12 feet. It has a stone altar and a small tower, and is approached by a long flight of fifty-two steps, which, according to the popular story, cannot be counted by any one both ways alike.¹

The tale is told that a silver bell hung above the chapel. This was stolen by pirates, but a tempest arose and the vessel was wrecked, but the bell was conveyed by angelic hands to the side of the well, where it was entombed in a rock, which on being struck gives a metallic sound.²

Govan's name cannot be perpetuated, as is generally supposed, in the Monmouthshire church-name Llangofen.³

S. Govan or Gobhan's Day is March 26, according to the Martyrologies of O'Gorman, and Donegal.

He is possibly known in Brittany as S. Gavan, at Plouguerneau, in Finistère, in a thoroughly Irish colonised district.

There was another saint of the same name, who belonged to a later generation, and who was a disciple of S. Fursa or Fursej.⁴ He had two brothers, Algeis and Etto, whom S. Fursej ordained priests along with Gobhan. They beheld the Lord Jesus, Who appeared to them in vision by night and said to them, "Come unto Me, all ye who labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you. Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world." Next day, being Sunday, they sought their master, and told him what had occurred, and how they had all seen the same vision, and heard the same words, and that, having taken counsel together, and remembering the words of Christ, "Unless a man forsake father and mother, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be My disciple," they had resolved to set forth on pilgrimage. Fursej, on hearing this, was glad, and gave thanks to God; but, smiling, said, "Certainly ye shall not go, unless I accompany you." He then called to him his two brothers, Ultan and Foillan, and said, "Do ye desire to serve Christ along with me?" They replied, "Whither thou goest, there will we go also." So Fursej and the rest departed from Ireland, taking ship for Britain. And after

¹ Fenton, Pembrokeshire, ed. 1811, pp. 414-6, ed. 1903, pp. 226-7; Tour in Quest of Genealogy through several parts of Wales, etc., by a Barrister, London, 1811, pp. 88-90; Arch. Camb., 1880, p. 338.

² Bye-Gones, second series, vol. vi, p. 278.

³ ii, p. 202. His name enters into the Uuor-govan of the Cartulary of Redon.

⁴ Colgan, Acta SS., Hib., Appendix ad Acta S. Fursæi, c. vi, p. 96.

having been for awhile among the East Saxons, they departed for Gaul.

Gobhan travelled along with Fursey to Corbeny in the department of Aisne, about sixteen miles south-east of Laon, on the way to Rheims. Here he and a band of brethren separated, after giving each other the kiss of peace, and each chose his own field for labour. Gobhan repaired to Laon and spent some time in the church of S. Vincent, which had been founded by Queen Brunehild after the death of Sigibert in 580. Desirous of making a new establishment, Gobhan, accompanied by a single disciple, penetrated to a place in the ancient forest of Vosage (Vosaga sylva, Vosagum foreste), which was haunted by wild beasts, and where he discovered an old fortress on the summit of a steep rock now called Le Mont de l'Hermitage.

There, wearied with his journey, he lay down; folding his hood under his head for a pillow, and planting his staff in the ground, he bade his disciple watch whilst he slept. Singing in his sleep, he chanted the psalm, "Lord, remember David and all his trouble; how he swore unto the Lord: and vowed a vow unto the Almighty God of Jacob; I will not come within the tabernacle of mine house: nor climb up into my bed; I will not suffer mine eyes to sleep, nor mine eyelids to slumber: neither the temples of my head to take any rest; until I find out a place for the temple of the Lord: an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob. Lo, we heard of the same at Ephrata: and found it in the wood." And then opening his eyes, he saw that a sparkling rill had broken out of the ground where he had set his staff, and he resolved on there setting up his rest for ever.

He went to Laon to Clothair II, and asked him to grant the site to him. This the king did, and thenceforth this portion of the forest has borne the name of the Forest of S. Goban.

He now set to work to construct a monastery, and to build a church. The people thereabouts were wild and stubborn, and Gobhan could not make much way with them. He interceded in prayer for the natives, praying, "Take away, O Lord, their guilt from them, or else take away my life."

In a vision of the night, the Lord spoke to him, and told him that barbarians more savage than the Vandals, were coming out of the North, and that he would fall by their swords.

Soon after a horde of invaders swept over the district, laying it waste, and, penetrating to his monastery, cut off his head. He was buried in the church afterwards called by his name. On the wall is inscribed: "O Gobane gratiam impetres et gloriam his qui tibi serviant," these being the closing lines of a sequence that gives a summary of his life. His day is June 20.¹ As far as can be judged, the date of his death was in 648.

Miss Margaret Stokes gives an interesting account of a visit to S. Goban near Laon.²

"We reached the Hermitage at last; I found that it had been occupied by a monk even within last century. It stands, as it were, on a tiny island in the middle of a pond filled with those little scarlet gold-fish which shoot like flame through the green depths of the forest mirrored in the water. . . . When I first saw the cave I was almost tempted to believe that it was a dolmen, but its vast size rendered that impossible. The chamber underneath the enormous rock which forms the roof, measures 10 feet 11 inches wide, and 13 feet in depth. Then three little cells, or closets, open at the back. It would be easy, by filling up the small open space behind, and by fixing a door and wooden plank in the front, to make this cave quite air-tight."

Near the Calvary at S. Goban is shown a large stone with a hollow in it, supposed to have been made by the saint's head, when he used the block for a pillow.

In the parish church are the relics of S. Gobhan, and a statue, as also an interesting sculpture as bas-relief in the retable, representing the life and martyrdom of the saint. Miss Stokes gives a representation of one compartment of the retable, showing Gobhan seated reading near his forest cell.

As Gobhan left East Anglia about 634, and Ireland some ten years earlier, he can hardly have been born before 578; this saint cannot, therefore, possibly be the same as the Gobhan who was cook to S. Ailbe, who died about 530, and the disciple of Senan of Iniscathy, which latter died about 568.

There is nothing to lead us to suppose that Gobhan, disciple of S. Fursey, ever was in Pembrokeshire, but there is a probability that his earlier namesake may have been there, as S. Ailbe was a native of Menevia and had his church, S. Elvis, now a ruin, at Solva.

S. GREDFYW, Confessor

THE pedigree of "Gredfyw of Llanllyfni" is known to occur in but few MSS., e.g. Cardiff MS. 5 (1527) and Hanesyn Hên (Cardiff MS. 25), p. 115, where he is given as the son of Ithel Hael of Llydaw, and the brother of Tegai, Gredifael, Llechid, and others. "Gredfiw of Llanllyfni," without pedigree, is given by Lewis Morris from one of the MSS. used by him in the compilation of his so-called alphabetical Bonedd y Saint.¹ The name of the patron of Llanllyfni is usually written Rhedyw, but this is an error due to not taking into account the initial mutation.²

¹ Acta SS. Boll., Jun. iv, pp. 23-5.

² Three Months in the Forests of France, London, 1895, pp. 217-25.

Llanllyfni is in Carnarvonshire, and it is there alone that he seems to have left his name, indicating it as the scene of his labours. The parish derives its name from the river. Ffynnon Redyw, his Holy Well, formerly enclosed within a small rectangular building, supplied the water for baptism.³ His shrine, popularly called Bedd Rhedyw, was, until a restoration of the church in the latter part of the eighteenth century, to be seen behind the altar, rising about two feet above the level of the floor; and outside the church, above the window of Capel Eithinog, is his effigy now very much defaced, which used to be held in great veneration. Opposite the effigy is a stone, now built into the churchyard wall, on which his devotees used to kneel before the effigy, and on which are said to be visible the impress of their knees.

There is a local tradition that the saint dwelt at a house in the parish called Eisteddfa Redyw (his seat), and the remains of his chair are still shown there. The print of his horse's hoof, and the mark of his thumb on a stone near it, are also shown. There is besides a cottage in the parish called Tyddyn Rhedyw.⁴

"The wake is holden on July 6, when a considerable number of persons assemble together to buy harvest implements, horses, and cattle."⁵ Others give Gwyl Redyw on November 11.⁶ It does not occur in any of the calendars.

S. GREDIFAEL, Confessor

GREDIFAEL, Gradifael, or Gredifel, was one of the sons of Ithel Hael of Llydaw,⁷ who migrated to Wales in the second half of the fifth

¹ Myv. Arch., p. 426.

² Ridicus, S. Garmon's father, is irregularly given as Rhedyw in the Iolo MSS., and he is once actually styled "saint" (p. 131). Gredfiw would be liable to be reduced to Gredyw, which is the form in Cavdiff MS. 5.

³ Arch. Camb., 1847, p. 209.

⁴ Ambrose, Hynafiaethau, etc., Nant Nanlle, Penygroes, 1872, pp. 16-7; Y Gwladgarwr, 1838, p. 44; Lewis, Topog. Dict. of Wales, s.v. Llanllyfni; Cymru, November, 1895, p. 226.

⁵ Carlisle, Topog. Dict. of Wales, 1811, s.v. Llanllyfni.

⁶ Browne Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 273; Cambrian Register, 1818, iii, p. 224.

⁷ Hanesyn Hên, p. 115; Myv. Arch., p. 426; Iolo MSS., pp. 112, 114, 133. Cynddelw (twelfth century), in his Ode to S. Tyssilio, seems to connect him with century. He and his favourite brother Fflewyn, we are told in the Iolo MSS.—but the statements are utterly unhistorical—were “saints of Côr y Ty Gwyn ar Dâf, in Dyfed, where they were with S. Pawl of Côr Illtyd, superintending a Bangor,” the foundation of which is also attributed to the three. The two brothers certainly founded a church each in Anglesey. Gredifael founded Penmynydd church, sometimes called Llanredifael. His shrine, Bedd Gredifael is in the little chapel, Capel Gredifael, in the church. It was formerly believed that if a person subject to fits lay for a night on Bedd Gredifael he would be cured of them. Ffynnon Redifael is in Cae Gredifael, near the church. Its water cured warts, which were first pricked with a pin until they bled and then washed in the well.

Some half a dozen Welsh calendars, and among them the earlier ones, have his festival entered against November 13; two have it against the 14th; and one against the 22nd. Browne Willis¹ gives the 13th, but Nicolas Owen² and Angharad Llwyd³ the 30th.

He is included by Dafydd Nanmor in his list of the hundred or more saints to whose guardianship he commits Henry VII.⁴

S. GREIT, Confessor

IN the Life of S. Elgar, the Bardsey hermit, in the Book of Llan Dâv, written from the account given by him to Caradog, probably of Llancarfan (died c. 1147), reference is made to one Greit or Graid, who is mentioned as a confessor. The hermit related how Dubricius, Deiniol, Padarn, and many another saint, who had been buried in Bardsey, constantly administered, in “the likeness of corporeal substance,” to his wants, and how one of them advised him one day to go to the grave of the confessor Greit, near to which, on a stone, God would send him every third morning a fish wherewith to sustain himself; but of this diet he by and by grew weary.⁵

Nothing is known of Greit, other than that he was one of the 20,000 saints buried in Bardsey.

Meifod, Montgomeryshire, where he is credited with having performed a miracle (Myv. Arch., p. 179). He is also mentioned in a poem by Gruffydd ab Meredydd (early fourteenth century), “Pawl pedyr gradivel y del oedv” (Red Book of Hergest, col. 1203; Myv. Arch., p. 297). Gradifael was also a district name (Gorchestion Beirdd Cymru, 2nd ed., p. 157).

¹ Bangor, 1721, p. 282.

² Hist. Anglesey, 1775, p. 58.

³ Hist. Anglesey, 1833, p. 328.

⁴ Iolo MSS., p. 314.

⁵ P. 3. See under S. ELGAR, ii. p. 434.

Two or more persons of the name occur, one, the son of Hoewgi, in the Gododin, and another, the son of Eri, in Culhwch and Olwen. These were probably considerably earlier.

S. GRWST, Confessor

GWRWST, Gorwst, or Grwst, was the son of Gwaith Hengaer, descended from Coel Hên (Godebog) through Urien Rheged. His mother was Euronwy, daughter of Clydno Eiddyn.¹ He is the patron of Llanrwst, in Denbighshire, in which parish is also his "Cataract," Rhaiadr Rwst. There was formerly in the church, "a wooden Image of this Saint in y^e Breod (? Rood) loft."² His festival, Gwyl Rwst, occurs on December 1 in a good many of the Welsh calendars. A fair used to be held at Llanrwst on the eve of his festival, O.S., and is still held on December 11. This accounts for the dedication of the church being sometimes given as to S. Andrew.³

The name of "Sanctus Grwst" occurs with SS. Daniel and Trillo, among the signatories to the grant by Maelgwn Gwynedd to S. Kentigern.⁴

S. GUDWAL, Bishop, Confessor

THE Life of S. Gudwal is a recomposition of a much more ancient biography, by a monk of Blandinberg. The Life exhibits a remarkable ¹ Peniarth MSS. 16 and 45; Hafod MS. 16; Hanesyn Hên, p. 113; Myv. Arch., p. 425, etc. In the Bonedd in Peniarth MS. 12, where his mother's name is wrongly given as Creirwy, he is called Gwrwst Letlwm, "the half bare," but this was the name of an ancestor, the grandson of Coel. Grwst is in Old-Welsh Gurgust, the literal equivalent of the Irish Fergus=Viro-gustus. The name occurs also in Pictish and Old-Breton. There are two streams in Carmarthenshire bearing the purely Irish form Fferws, i.e. Fergus. In the Taxatio of 1291, p. 287, Llanrwst is given as Lanŵrvst. As a common noun Gwrwst means the cramp. The name is to be distinguished from that of Gwrgwest or Gwrwest, daughter of Ceneu, which, however, is matched by the Breton Gourvest or Gurvest of Plou-gourvest, in Finistère.

² Bp. Maddox's (1736-43) MS. Z, in the Episcopal Library, S. Asaph.

³ Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 364. December 1 is entered as his day in the calendars prefixed to the Welsh Prayer Book and New Testament of 1567, and Bibles of 1588 and 1620. In a sixteenth century list of Welsh fairs (Cardiff MS. 11) we have, "Ffair yn llan Rwst gwyl ondras."

⁴ Red Book of S. Asaph, p. 118, in the Episcopal Library, S. Asaph.

? for Gwrwst-wst knowledge of the localities, such as could only have been acquired by one living on the spot ; but along with this occur grotesque blunders, where the Flemish monk who recomposed the Life endeavoured to improve what he found in the text, and by so doing fell into error.

This Life is found in the Acta SS. Boll. Jun. i, pp. 729-42 ; a critique thereon in vi, pp. 84-7. The same, abridged by John of Tynemouth, in Capgrave's Nova Legenda Angliæ, but with the addition of a few miracles.

The relics of the saint were conveyed to Blandinberg near Ghent in or shortly after 919, to preserve them from the ravages of the Northmen. With them was doubtless brought the original Vita. This was laid under contribution by a monk of Blandinberg, who was also the author of a sermon on the Translation of the saint. As in this latter there is an allusion to the death of Gilbert, abbot of Blandinberg, which took place in 1138, we may place this Life as a composition of the middle of the twelfth century. Much confusion has been occasioned by the identification of Gudwal with a totally distinct personage, Gurwal, Bishop of Aleth. Albert le Grand gives the Life of S. Gurwal taken from the old Legendarium in MS. of the diocese of S. Malo, and in this there is not a trace of the fusion ; but in the later Breviary of S. Malo, the two have been identified.

On account of the devastation wrought by the Saxons, and the ravages of plague, a great exodus took place from Britain.¹

Cadoc was one of those who fled from the Yellow Plague in 547, and we may assume that he took Gudwal with him. When in Brittany, Cadoc founded a monastery on an islet in the Sea of Etel near Belz. After a while he departed, and committed the charge of his settlement to a monk Cadwaladr.† We may suppose that Gudwal was at the time too young and inexperienced to assume the headship.

The Isle of S. Cadou is very small, too small for it to be possible for a large community to subsist on it, whereas over against it is another of considerable extent, now occupied by farms. The biographer says that Gudwal elected this larger island to which to retreat, and that he carried off with him a hundred and eighty-eight of the brethren. He says that he went thither for retirement ; but that cannot have been a private retreat, when he had such a number of monks with him. It looks rather as if there had been a schism in the community.

According to local tradition, Gudwal disembarked on the promontory of Plec, which the author of the Life calls Plecit. Here to this day is pointed out the hillock, called Verdon, on which the new settlement was made, and whereon he elicited a spring by striking the soil with his staff. Here stands now a chapel dedicated to S. Brigid, and near it a lech bearing the inscription IAOU.¹

¹ "Sanctus Gudwalus Britannia finibus ortus, ex nobili prosapia : ejus tempus nativitatis erat quo se mucro furoris domini a terra illa suspendit ; quam eo usque gladio, fame, et peste afflixit."

? of B. Walton. G. W. C. t

On slightly rising ground in the long peninsula, that was then an island, Gudwal planted his caer, his stockaded residence, and a farmhouse that recalls him in its name Kergoal, now occupies the site. But the bustle and distraction of the place was too much for Gudwal. Going to the extremity of Le Plec he looked across an arm of the still island sea, and his eye rested on a nook on another island that took his fancy. The inland sea of Etel is in shape like an octopus, with its long, writhing arms extended on every side. The island that now arrested the imagination of Gudwal was one of promontories and bays, and in the depth of one of these bays he planted his place of retreat, Locoal. The land was covered with oak trees.

The Blandinberg monk misunderstood the text of the Life he recomposed, in which the spur of land called Le Plec had been noticed for its length, and it is in fact six miles long. But he took the passage to mean its elevation, and so has converted the low gravelly strip of land into a prodigious cliff; and knowing nothing of the composition of the subsoil, which is granite, he has made this imaginary cliff to be of marble.² The author of the Life says that Gudwal contrived an ingenious apparatus (machina) to keep out the tide, and that he employed the monks in raising dykes, and that he established a water mill, probably turned by the outrush of the tidal waters. The embankment was miraculously constructed, according to the Blandinberg monk, as a protection against the furious billows of the ocean. But the sea of Etel ripples under the breeze, the tide enters through a narrow mouth, and never can be lashed into anything more serious than wavelets.

Many stories are told of the saint, borrowed from various sources, as that he plucked a thorn out of the foot of a wolf that approached him limping, asking with pleading eyes to be relieved. The old tale of Androcles revived, told also of one of the saints of the Syrian desert.

How long Gudwal lived at Plec, with occasional retreats in Lent and for rest at Locoal we are not told, but after a time he wearied of his residence there, and departed to the fringe of the forest of Camors. This lies to the south of the Tarun, a confluent of the Blavet. Here resided a chief who had migrated to Cornouaille (in Cornuviam),¹ on account of the discord that reigned in his native land. His name is given as Mevor. He probably occupied the old fortress that had belonged there to Conmore.

¹ De la Borderie, Hist. de Bretagne, i, p. 493.

² "Rupem vastam prominentem, instar habitabilis insulæ . . . hanc erga marmoreæ soliditate innitentem, cum mari in gyro concludebat, nullo inter se compugnantium fluctuum turbine quassat." Acta SS. Boll., Jun. i, p. 730.

Gudwal sent a deputation to him to ask permission to settle on his land. This was granted, and he formed a colony at Locoal in what since 1790 has been the commune of Camors, at a distance of three kilometres to the south of the present parish church. Here Gudwal collected about him two hundred monks, and here he died.

His body was taken back to his former retreat on the Sea of Etel, and there it remained till the ravages of the Northmen at the beginning of the tenth century compelled the monks to abandon the place, and fly with it to Blandinberg in Flanders.

An outrageous story is told of his relics by his biographer. In the year 1043, when the body was being borne processionally round the church on his festival, the figure of Christ on the rood suddenly, with a loud report, wrenched out the nails that held the hands, and turning about, respectfully (humiliter) bowed to the body of the saint.

S. Gudwal's Day in the Brev. Venet., 1586, and the Vannes Missal of 1530 is June 6; as Gurval he occurs in the Vannes Breviary of 1583 and that of 1609. In the fifteenth century MS. calendar of S. Méen on June 7. Whytford has on June 6, "the feest of Saynt Goodwale, a bisshope borne of y^e noble blode of Englonde, that for synguler perfeccyon resygned his mytre and dwelled upon a desolate rocke where he buylded a monastery, and by miracle had there a well of quykke water, and there he gadered clxxxviii monkes; and because the rome was lytell he went unto the see at the lowest ebbe and charged the see in the name of our Lorde it shold kepe that place and never flowe nearer the monastery, and so had y^e groũde for ever; he heled the seke, reysed ye deed, with many other myracles, and had revelaciõs of augels."

He is entered also in Nicolas Roscarrock's calendar on the same day. A tomb was erected over his grave in Locoal church in 1666, with a figure of the saint on it. But in 1878 the original tomb of the saint is thought to have been found below the floor of the church. No church was founded by the saint in Wales or in Cornwall. The supposition that Gulval in the latter has him for patron is erroneous.

Gudwal is invoked in the tenth century Celtic Litany in the library of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury, as Guidgual.¹ In that published by Mabillon from a MS. at Rheims, as Goidwal ;² and in that of S. Vougai as Guidgual. De la Villemarqué read Guitgual.³ Gudwal is shortened in Breton into Goal. He has a chapel at Calan in the parish of Brech, Morbihan, also at Ploemel and Pluvigner and Ste. Helène in the same department.

¹ He had entered Cornouaille. To reach him the messengers were obliged to traverse a vast forest. The Bollandists mistook Cornuvia for Cornwall, and supposed that Gulval by Penzance was founded by S. Gudwal. Cornubia is, however, clearly the kingdom of Cornubia in Armorica.

S. GUENOLE, see S. WINWALOE.

S. GUERNABUI, Priest, Confessor

A DISCIPLE of S. Dyfrig, a cleric ;⁴ he was appointed princeps or head of the monastic settlement at Garth Benni.⁵

Pepiau, son of Erb, King of Erging, granted Mainaur Garth Benni " usque ad paludem nigrum inter silvam et campum et aquam et jaculum Constantini regis socii sui, trans Guy amnem " to God and Dubricius, and delivered it into the hand of Junapeius.⁶

This is identified as Welsh Bicknor, enfolded by the Wye. What is meant by the " jaculum Constantini regis " is difficult to conjecture, but perhaps it was an upright menhir bearing that name.

Guernabui is mentioned as having had an alumnus named Gurguare,⁷ probably a disciple intended to succeed him in the rule of Garth Benni. He appears to have been associated with Aidan the bishop at the granting of Mafurn by Cinuin, son of Pepiau ;⁸ and at the grant by Athruis, King of Gwent, to Bishop Comeregius ; a regrant after devastation, of Lann Cinmarch, Lann Deui, Lann Junabui, and other churches, he appears as Guernapui Gurit Penni, i.e. of Garthbenni, and his disciple Gurguare as of Lann Enniaun, or Llandogo, in Monmouthshire.⁹ Guernabui does not appear to have been a founder, nor to have received any cult.

¹ Revue Celtique, 1888, p. 88.

² Vetera Analecta, 1723, ii, p. 669.

³ Vies des Saints de Bretagne, par Alb. le Grand, ed. 1901, pp. 225-6.

⁴ Book of Llan Dâu, pp. 75, 77, 80. His name to-day would appear as Gwernabwy. For the second element-bui, see under S. GWENABWY.

⁵ Ibid., p. 164.

⁶ Ibid., p. 72.

⁷ Ibid., p. 164.

⁸ Ibid., pp. 162-3.

⁹ Ibid., pp. 165-6.

S. GUNDLEUS, see S. GWYNLLYW

S. GUNGUARUI, see S. GWARW and S. WINWALOE

S. GUNUINUS, Confessor

GUNUINUS, or Gunuiu, was a disciple of S. Dubricius.¹ As Gunninus (otherwise Gunnbiu) Magister he occurs as one of the leading clergy that took part in the election of Oudoceus as Bishop of Llandaff, and were afterwards present at his consecration at Canterbury.² He signed two grants to Bishop Berthguin as Gunuiu Lector.³

He cannot be identified with the Guinnius that came over with S. Padarn from Brittany to Llanbadarn, and was one of the four duces whom he placed over the churches he had founded in Ceredigion.⁴

+ What is Guinnius?

S. GUORBOE, Confessor

THE little that we know of this saint is to be found in the Book of Llan Dâv. There a grant occurs⁵ in which Guoruodu, King of Erging, gave to Bishop Uvelviu an uncia of land, "in the midst of which he erected a building in honour of the Holy Trinity, and there placed his priest Guoruoe," to perform the offices of the church, which was named Lann Guorboe from its first priest-in-charge—a good illustration of the mode of Welsh church "dedication" during the earliest period. The church has been identified, but wrongly, with Garway, in Herefordshire. It is said to be in campo Malochu,⁶ some distance to the north of Garway. Two later grants, to Bishops Junapeius and Comeregius, are witnessed by "Elhearn Abbas Lann Guorboe."⁷

Guoruoe, or Guruoe, was clerical witness to two grants in Erging to Bishop Grecielis.⁸ Possibly the persons are not identical.

The name would to-day assume the form Gwrfwy or Gorfwy, as would also the Herefordshire river-name Guormui, or Gurmuy,⁹ now known in English as the Worm.

¹ Book of Llan Dâv, p. 80. The name would be to-day Gwynfyw.

² Ibid., pp. 131-2, 140.

³ Ibid., pp. 182, 189.

⁴ Cambro-British Saints, p. 191.

⁵ P. 162.

⁶ Ibid., p. 165, and see i, p. 109, ii, p. 414 of this work.

⁷ Ibid., pp. 164, 166.

⁸ Ibid., p. 170.

⁹ Ibid., pp. 43, 134-5. Gwrfwy is to be distinguished from Gwrfyw (Gurbiu).

S. GUORDOCUI, Abbot, Confessor

GUORDOCUI was a disciple of S. Dubricius,¹ and appears as a witness in two grants made to that saint.² Later he is given as abbot of Llanddewi or Dewchurch, in Herefordshire.³ He must have lived on to the times of Athruis, King of Gwent, son of Mouric, and father of Morcant, for he was one of the witnesses of the regranting of a number of the Dubricius churches to Comeregius, the bishop. But that Comeregius was ever bishop of Llandaff is more than doubtful. Later all the churches granted to him fell under the hand of the Bishop of Llandaff, and then it was feigned that he had been the eighth prelate in that see.⁴

The date of the death of Morcant is probably 665. This is given in the Annales Cambriæ, but the Morcant there specified is not spoken of as son of Athruis, so that we cannot be certain. If this be Morcant son of Athruis, usually known as Morgan Mwynfawr, then the date of Athruis would be early in the seventh century.

Guordocui would in modern Welsh be Gwrddogwy.

S. GUORVAN, Bishop, Confessor

A DISCIPLE of S. Dyfrig,⁵ who witnessed a number of grants to him. His name takes several forms, as Gurvan, Gorvan, and Guoren. As bishop he is named as present when Teudur, son of Rein, and Elgistil, son of August, Kings of Brycheiniog, swore to keep the peace on the altar of S. Dyfrig and the Holy Gospels. After that Teudur slew Elgistil, and was excommunicated by Gurvan and his clergy, who stripped the altar, and laid the crosses on the ground, along with the relics of the saints. Teudur submitted, and paid compensation for his crime by surrendering Lann Mihacgel Tref Ceriau, in Brecknockshire.⁶

The grant has been modernised. There were no churches dedicated to S. Michael before 718,⁷ in Wales, and the compiler of the Book of Llan Dâv altered the ancient name to that by which the place was known in his own day. The church in question has been supposed to be Llanfihangel Tal y Llyn, in Brecknockshire. The same compiler converted Guorvan into the tenth bishop of Llandaff.⁸ With Llandaff he probably never had anything to do.

In the *Iolo MSS.*⁹ it is stated that Bishop Gwrfan of Llandaff

¹ Book of Llan Dâv, p. 80.

² Ibid., pp. 75, 77.

³ Ibid., pp. 164, 166.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 303, 311.

⁵ Ibid., p. 80.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 167-8.

⁷ Annales Cambriæ, s.a. ⁸ Book of Llan Dâv, pp. 303, 311. ⁹ P. 221.

founded Llansanffraid Fawr, or S. Bride's Major, and the church of Drenewydd Ynottais, or Newton Nottage (now dedicated to S. John Baptist), both in Glamorganshire.

S. GURHAUAL, Abbot, Confessor

GURHAUAL, or, as his name is also spelt, Guorhauarn and Gurthauar was "Abbas Ilduti," i.e. Abbot of Llantwit, who was one of the three great abbots of the Diocese of Llandaff. His name occurs as witness to a number of grants in the Book of Llan Dâv during the episcopates of Oudoceus, Berthgwin, and Trichan.¹

S. GURMAET, Confessor

A DISCIPLE first of S. Dubricius and afterwards of S. Teilo,² and patron of Lann Guraet,³ now Llandeilo 'r Fân, on the Mawen, in Brecknockshire, and also of S. Wormet,⁴ somewhere near Chepstow and Tintern, possibly where stands Howick at present.

His name would appear in modern Welsh as Gwrfaed.

S. GURON, Hermit, Confessor

LELAND gives among extracts from the Cartulary of Bodmin, in Cornwall,⁵ "Bosmana, id est, mansio monachorum in valle, ubi S. Guronus solitarie degens in parvo tugurio, quod relinquens tradidit S. Petroco."

It is probable that Goran in the Deanery of S. Austell was the place to which he retired. He had a chapel at Bodmin, and also at Gorran Haven. The episcopal estate at Goran is called Polgorran. S. Goran

¹ See index to Book of Llan Dâv, p. 403. The name occurs as Guorhual on p. 202, and in Brittany as Uurhamal. For the element-hual, see ii, p. 254.

² Book of Llan Dâv, p. 115.

³ Ibid., pp. 154, 255.

⁴ Ibid., p. 323, in the fourteenth century Synodalia.

⁵ Collect. i, p. 75.

is called Gorronus in Bishop Brantyngham's Register, 1270, and Goranus in those of 1271 and 1272.

According to William of Worcester, he was commemorated in the Bodmin Antiphony as Woronocus on April 7. His Holy Well is in the churchyard at Bodmin, on the south-west side of the parish church.

The village Feast at S. Goran is on Low Sunday.

Nicolas Roscarrock conjecturally identifies him with Gwron ab Cunedda.¹

S. GURTHIERN, Confessor

THE authority for this saint is a Life in the Cartulary of Quimperlé, published by Léon Maitre and Paul de Berthou, Paris, Le Chevalier, 1896, pp. 3-7. It is a document of very slender historic value.

It opens with a pedigree of Gurthiern, whom it makes son of Bonus, son of Gloui, son of Abros, son of Dos, son of Jacob, son of Genethan, son of Judgual, son of Beli, son of Outham the Old, son of Maximian (Maximus), son of Constantius, son of Constantine the Great.

Bonus is given by Nennius as the son of Gloiu, and brother of Guitolin, who was grandfather of Gwrtheyrn, the recreant Vortigern. But all the earlier pedigree above Gloui is fictitious.

Gloui is the Gloiu who is said to have built, and given his name to, Caer Loew, or Gloucester (Jesus College MS. 20).

The author also gives the maternal ancestry of Gurthiern. His mother was Denoi, daughter of Lidin, King of all Britain. Clearly Tenoi is meant, daughter of Lleuddun Luyddog. She was married to Dingad ab Nudd Hael. The pedigree would stand thus:—

There is some chronological blunder in Nennius, in making Gwrtheyrn grandson of Guitolin. In fact, his pedigree cannot be trusted at all.

The Life goes on to say that Outham the Old was father of two sons, Beli and Kenan (Meiriadog), and so identifies him with Eudaf Hên, the father of Helen or Elen, wife of Maximus.¹ This will suffice to show how worthless the genealogy in the Life is. Gurthiern was engaged when a young man in a contest, in which he killed his sister's son, and, filled with compunction, he retired from the world into a valley "in the northern part of Britain." There he spent a year, after which, attended by two servants, he departed, and meeting a woman who was carrying a human head, he asked her what she was about. She replied that her son had been decapitated, and that as she could not carry away his body, she was conveying his head to his tomb, "ad monumentum ejus."

¹ See ii, p. 192.

Gurthiern then miraculously restored the dead man to life, having first replaced the head on his neck.

Then he departed to the neighbourhood of the River Tamar, where he and his followers resided for a long time.²

An angel appeared to him, and bade him enter a vessel³ which he would see floating on the sea. This he did, and was wafted to a certain island off the coast of Armorica, the Isle of Groix, where he remained till he received another call to depart to the place prepared for him, named Anaurot (Quimperlé), where he remained to the end of his days.

The writer of this Life informs us that he obtained his material from a certain faithful layman named Juthael, son of Aidan.

In addition, we have a document narrating how that in or about 1037 the relics of Gurthiern were discovered in the Isle of Groix. In this document, Gurthiern is entitled "Rex Anglorum," and is made a contemporary of Grallo, King of Cornouaille (470-505), and of Weroc, Count of Vannes (500-550). It makes Grallo the donor to him of Anaurot or Quimperlé; and it further states that at a time when the crops were ravaged by insects, Goeroc (Weroc) sent to Gurthiern an embassy consisting of three men, Guedgual, Catuoth and Cadur, to solicit his aid. The saint blessed some water and bade that the crops afflicted should be sprinkled with it, which done the insects disappeared. In return for this, Weroc granted to him the plou of Kervignac on the Blavet, in Morbihan. The name by which Gurthiern is known to the Bretons is Gonlay or Gondlé.

¹ "Ipse Kenan tenuit principatum quando perexerunt Britones ad Romam. Illic tenuerunt Leticiam" (Llydaw). The genealogy further makes Anna-cousin of the B.V. Mary, to have been wife of Outham, who was son of Maximus, killed in 388! Gloiu as a man's name is well attested; three are indexed in the Book of Llan Dáv.

² "Exierunt ad ripam fluminis quod dicitur Tamar, et ibi manserunt long tempore."

³ "Aspicite mare cotidie et veniet ad vos vas in quod intrabitis."

Where he tarried on the Tamar can only be matter of conjecture. Poughill, near Stratton, near, but not on the Tamar, is dedicated to S. Olaf. It is possible enough that a king saint such as Olaf may have been substituted for a British royal saint with a name unpronounceable by English mouths.

The Feast of Gurthiern was observed in Brittany in the diocese of Quimper on June 29, but was transferred to July 3, on account of its incidence on the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul.

There is a statue of S. Gurthiern in his chapel on the Ile de Groix, representing him as an aged hermit, in long habit, bareheaded, and holding a staff.

The name Gurthiern is the same as Gwrtheyrn or Vortigern. Usually, and in calendars and liturgically, the saint is called Gunthiern..

S. GURUID

IN the *Book of Llan Dâv*¹ occurs the grant of Meurig, King of Morganwg, to Bishop Oudoceus, of Ecclesia Guruid, which seems to be the Llan Irwydd of the Myvyrian Parish-list,² where it is entered between the parishes of Llangoven and Llanfihangel Tor y Mynydd, in Monmouthshire. Guruid is presumably the name of a Welsh saint, but of him nothing is known.

S. GURVAN, Hermit

ALL that we know of Gurvan occurs in the Life of S. Clydog, and a grant in the Book of Llan Dâv.³ He, his brother Lybiau (Libio), and his sister's son, Cinuur (Cynfwr), left Penychen, one of the ancient cantrefs of Central Glamorgan, owing to some dispute, and settled at Clodocċ, on the River Monnow, in Herefordshire, and there led an eremitical and solitary life. "With the advice and assistance of the ³ Pp. 194-5; see ii, pp. 154, 245, of this work.

¹ P. 143.

² Myv. Arch., p. 749. It does not occur in the same list in Dr. Gwenogvryn Evans' Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 919, Llan Issen being substituted for it.

Bishop of Llandaff, they built an improved church " on the spot, and Pennbargaut, King of Morganwg, made a grant to it of lands on both sides the Monnow.

These three hermits were " the first inhabitants and cultivators of the place after the martyrdom of Clydog." Cinuur had four sons. Ithel, son of Morgan, King of Glywysing, subsequently made a grant of the territory to Bishop Berthguin of Llandaff.

S. GURWAL, Bishop, Confessor

THE authorities for S. Gurwal are : a Life in three lections in the Breviary of S. Malo, 1517 and 1537, Acta SS. Boll. Junii i, p. 727 ; also a Life in Albert Le Grand's Collection, from a Legendarium in MS. of the church of S. Malo, now lost. There is a Life in MS. Bibl. Nat., Paris, MS. Français 22321, p. 776.

S. Gurwal was a native of Britain, and almost certainly related to S. Machu (Malo) and to S. Samson. He is said to have led a religious life from early childhood, and to have been a disciple of S. Brendan, and then to have founded a monastery of which he became abbot.

The introduction of S. Brendan is due to his history having been vitiated by the interpolated Life of S. Machu, who was said to have been educated at Llancarfan by Brendan, who was its abbot. Brendan never was abbot there ; after Cadoc came Elli, and the names of the successors are known through the Book of Llan Dâw and the cartulary that follows the Life of S. Cadoc. When Machu retired to Saintes, about the year 614 or 615, he informed his monks that he had designated Gurwal to be his successor, no doubt because he was nearest of kin.

On the death of Malo in or about 621 Gurwal was visited by a delegation from Aleth, and he reluctantly consented to leave Wales and accompany them to Armorica. He remained over the see but a year and a few months, and then resigned in 622 or 623. He probably found himself incompetent as a bishop.

He then retired to Gwern, now called Guer, in the forest of Brecilien, near Ploërmel in the diocese of S. Malo, formerly, now included in that of Vannes. There he remained till he died.

The parish church there is dedicated to him. The site of his retreat is l'Abbaye, now a hamlet. An ancient building remains there with round-headed windows, and walls of herring-bone masonry.

the plou of Kervignac on the Blavet, in Morbihan. The name by which Gurthiern is known to the Bretons is Gonlay or Gondlé.

Where he tarried on the Tamar can only be matter of conjecture. Poughill, near Stratton, near, but not on the Tamar, is dedicated to S. Olaf. It is possible enough that a king saint such as Olaf may have been substituted for a British royal saint with a name unpronounceable by English mouths.

The Feast of Gurthiern was observed in Brittany in the diocese of Quimper on June 29, but was transferred to July 3, on account of its incidence on the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul.

There is a statue of S. Gurthiern in his chapel on the Ile de Groix, representing him as an aged hermit, in long habit, bareheaded, and holding a staff.

The name Gurthiern is the same as Gwrtheyrn or Vortigern. Usually, and in calendars and liturgically, the saint is called Gunthiern.

S. GURUID

IN the Book of Llan Dâv ¹ occurs the grant of Meurig, King of Morganwg, to Bishop Oudoceus, of Ecclesia Guruid, which seems to be the Llan Irwydd of the Myvyrian Parish-list, ² where it is entered between the parishes of Llangoven and Llanfihangel Tor y Mynydd, in Monmouthshire. Guruid is presumably the name of a Welsh saint, but of him nothing is known.

S. GURVAN, Hermit

ALL that we know of Gurban occurs in the Life of S. Clydog, and a grant in the Book of Llan Dâv. ³ He, his brother Lybiau (Llibio), and his sister's son, Cinuur (Cynfwr), left Penychen, one of the ancient cantrefes of Central Glamorgan, owing to some dispute, and settled at Clodock, on the River Monnow, in Herefordshire, and there led an eremitical and solitary life. "With the advice and assistance of the ³ Pp. 194-5; see ii, pp. 154, 245, of this work.

¹ P. 143.

² Myv. Arch., p. 749. It does not occur in the same list in Dr. Gwenogvryn Evans' Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 919, Llan Issen being substituted for it.

Bishop of Llandaff, they built an improved church " on the spot, and Pennbargaut, King of Morganwg, made a grant to it of lands on both sides the Monnow.

These three hermits were " the first inhabitants and cultivators of the place after the martyrdom of Clydog." Cinuur had four sons. Ithel, son of Morgan, King of Glywysing, subsequently made a grant of the territory to Bishop Berthguin of Llandaff.

S. GURWAL, Bishop, Confessor

THE authorities for S. Gurwal are : a Life in three lections in the Breviary of S. Malo, 1517 and 1537, Acta SS. Boll. Junii i, p. 727 ; also a Life in Albert Le Grand's Collection, from a Legendarium in MS. of the church of S. Malo, now lost. There is a Life in MS. Bibl. Nat., Paris, MS. Français 22321, p. 776.

S. Gurwal was a native of Britain, and almost certainly related to S. Machu (Malo) and to S. Samson. He is said to have led a religious life from early childhood, and to have been a disciple of S. Brendan, and then to have founded a monastery of which he became abbot.

The introduction of S. Brendan is due to his history having been vitiated by the interpolated Life of S. Machu, who was said to have been educated at Llancarfan by Brendan, who was its abbot. Brendan never was abbot there ; after Cadoc came Elli, and the names of the successors are known through the Book of Llan Dâw and the cartulary that follows the Life of S. Cadoc. When Machu retired to Saintes, about the year 614 or 615, he informed his monks that he had designated Gurwal to be his successor, no doubt because he was nearest of kin.

On the death of Malo in or about 621 Gurwal was visited by a delegation from Aleth, and he reluctantly consented to leave Wales and accompany them to Armorica. He remained over the see but a year and a few months, and then resigned in 622 or 623. He probably found himself incompetent as a bishop.

He then retired to Gwern, now called Guer, in the forest of Breilien, near Ploërmel in the diocese of S. Malo, formerly, now included in that of Vannes. There he remained till he died.

The parish church there is dedicated to him. The site of his retreat is l'Abbaye, now a hamlet. An ancient building remains there with round-headed windows, and walls of herring-bone masonry.

“Cela sent, à n'en point douter, l'art romain en décadence, ou le roman primitif ; c'est un débris curieux et rare, qui merite d'être religieusement conservé.”¹

S. Gurwal is given in the MS. Missal of S. Malo of the fifteenth century on June 12, but in the S. Malo Breviary of 1537 on June 6, the same day as S. Gudwal, with whom he is often confounded, but with whom he has no connexion. The S. Malo Breviary of 1627 on June 6.

Under the name of Gurguaer or Gurguall, he is invoked in the eleventh century Litany published by D'Arbois de Jubainville.² It is difficult to discover his name in Gwent, where it should be sought.³

S. GUYER or GUIER, Hermit, Confessor

WHEN S. Neot came to the place now called after him, he found a cell that had been occupied previously by a venerable hermit, named Guier, and he took up his residence in it.

Nothing is known about him.

Nicolas Roscarrock enters on May 7, “Deposition of S. Wier, Confessor.”

A chapel was dedicated to him at S. Neot.

S. GWAINERTH, Hermit, Confessor

OF this saint we know but little. His church, Lann Sant Guainerth, is mentioned in the *Book of Llan Dâv*⁴ as one of the churches in Erging belonging to that see. It is now known as S. Weonard's, on the old coach-road from Hereford to Monmouth. The Welsh form of the church-name is somewhat unusual. It was not the practice among the Welsh to “style” a purely Welsh saint.

The saint is said to have been a hermit, who sought retirement here, and was formerly represented as an old man sustaining a book

¹ Rosenzweig in Bulletin politique, 1872, p. 142.

² Revue Celtique, iii, p. 449 ; xi, pp. 136, 143.

³ In Revue de Bretagne, Dec., 1909, M. de Calan maintains the identity of Gudwal with Gurwal, but this M. Loth, a better authority, will not admit.

⁴ Pp. 275-7. It is to be distinguished from Lan Waynarth, now Llanwenarth, on the Usk, in Monmouthshire.

and with an ox in the painted glass that adorned the north chancel window of the church.¹

S. GWALEHES, Hermit, Confessor

ALL we know of this saint is to be found in the Life of S. Cadoc² (Cotton Vesp. A. xiv). His name is written in the MS. Gwalehes, Gualéés and Waléés. One day Cadoc sailed with his two disciples, Barruc and Gwalehes, from the island of Echni (the Flat Holmes) to the island of Barry, both in the Bristol Channel. On landing he asked them for his enchiridion, or manual. They replied that they had lost it on the Flat Holmes. In a fury he ordered them to re-embark and recover it, and cursed them that they might never return. They went on their errand and found the book, and started on their return journey. Cadoc was sitting on a hill-top in the island awaiting their return, and saw in the distance their boat suddenly overturn, and both men drowned. Barruc's body was cast on Barry Island, and buried there, but that of Gwalehes "was carried by the sea to the island of Echni, and there buried." The manual was afterwards found inside a salmon caught by his attendants for Cadoc's dinner, "free from all injury by water."

Gwalehes is mentioned by Camden, who says that he was a disciple of Barruc, as he learned from an ancient monument in Llandaff Cathedral, but gives no copy of the inscription. Last century a tombstone was found on the Flat Holmes, conjectured to be that of the saint, but simply bore a cross.³

S. GWARTHAN, Martyr

GWARTHAN was the son of Dunawd ab Pabo Post Prydyn, and brother of SS. Deiniol and Cynwyl. His mother was Dwywai, daughter of Lleenog. His title to sainthood, which is somewhat doubtful, rests entirely upon the late documents in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ He and his brothers are there credited with having had a share in the establishing of Bangor Iscoed. Previously the three were "disciples" at Llanancarfan, where Gwarthan was Cadoc's periglawr or confessor, and it was Cadoc that sent them to "superintend" the Bangor. He was "killed by the pagan Saxons in their wars in the North. His church is Llanwarthen,² in the Vale of Clwyd." There is no trace whatever to-day of a church of the name in the Vale.

¹ Arch. Camb., 1855, p. 161; 1861, p. 116. Kerslake, in his Saint Richard, 1890, p. 33, makes a mistake when he identifies Gwainerth with S. Fingar or Gwinear.

² Cambro-British Saints, pp. 63-4. The Isle of Gresholm, off the coast of Pembrokeshire, is called in Welsh Gwales. ³ Ibid., p. 357.

He was a warrior, and appears to have fallen in the battle of Catraeth. He is mentioned in the Gododin as "Guarchan, son of Dwywei, of gallant bravery."³

S. GWARW

SOME late writers⁴ mention Gwarw or Gwarwg as a saint of Gwent, by whom is meant the patron of the church still called by the Welsh Llanwarw,⁵ but by the English, Wonastow, near Monmouth. It is usually given to-day as dedicated to S. Gwyno or Wonnou. Its real patron, however, is the well-known S. Winwaloe. In the *Book of Llan Dâw*⁶ the church is called Lann Gunguarui, which occurs later as Wonwarrowstow, Wonwarestowe, etc. Gwarw represents *g*uarui. The English would appear to have preserved the first, and the Welsh the last part of the name.⁷

See further under S. WINWALOE.

S. GWAWR, Matron

ALL the authorities, both early and late, agree in the few particulars there are respecting this saint.⁸ She was a daughter of Brychan

¹ Pp. 126, 129, 150-1; and ii, pp. 275, 326, of this work.

² "Lanwarthan" is the spelling of a submanor name of Narberth in a charter of 1413-4 (Edw. Owen, Catal. of MSS. relating to Wales in Brit. Mus., p. 626).

³ Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, p. 91; i, p. 407. Stephens, in his Gododin, makes Gwarthan succeed his father in his patrimony of Gododin (see the index, p. 412).

⁴ E.g. Iolo MSS., p. 144.

⁵ Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 919; Myv. Arch., p. 749. It occurs also as Llanwarwg.

⁶ P. 201.

⁷ Y Cymmrodor, xi, p. 85.

⁸ Cognatio de Brychan; Cambro-British Saints, p. 271; Myv. Arch., pp. 419.

Brycheiniog, and became the wife of Elidyr Lydanwyn and mother of the well-known bard Llywarch Hên. Elidyr was a prince of the Northern Brythons, of the race of Coel Hên, and Llywarch's patrimony we learn, was Argoed Llwyfain, which Skene locates on the river Leven.¹

The Progenies Keredic and the pedigrees in Jesus College MS. 20 give a Gwawr who was daughter of Ceredig ab Cunedda Wledig and mother of Gwynllyw, the father of S. Cadoc; but elsewhere she is Gwawl. The former document mentions also a Pedyr Lanwaur who was nephew to Gwawr. Lanwaur here may stand for either Llan Wawr or Llan Fawr, but the exact situation of the church and whether this Gwawr may be regarded as its foundress, are questions which cannot be satisfactorily determined.²

S. GWAWRDDYDD, Matron

GWAWRDDYDD is given as one of the reputed daughters of Brychan, but her name occurs only in the late lists of his children.³ According to these she was the wife of Cadell Deyrnllwg, and mother of Cyngen; but she has clearly been confounded with Tudglid, the wife of Cyngen, and mother of Cadell. She is sometimes said to have been a saint in Merionethshire, in particular at Towyn.⁴ Gwenddydd, another reputed daughter of Brychan, is connected with Towyn, and so is Cerdech, another daughter. See under both names.

S. GWDDYN, see S. GWYDDYN

S. GWEIRYDD, King, Confessor

ALL that we know of this saint, whose title to a place among the Welsh saints is extremely doubtful, is to be found in a document 426; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 120, 140. Gwawr, and also Gwawrddydd, are names for Aurora and the dawn.

¹ Four Ancient Books, ii. p. 413.

² See, however, Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, pp. 469-70.

³ Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 426; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 120, 140. Geoffrey of Monmouth gives a Gwawrddydd, daughter of Efrog.

⁴ Peniarth MS. 178; Cambro-British Saints, p. 270.

printed in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ from a MS. circa 1580, which gives the "Names and Genealogy of the Kings of Glamorgan from Morgan Mwynfawr to Iestyn ab Gwrgan," wherein it is stated, "Gweirydd ab Brochfael was a wise, but unfortunate king; for diseases and rough, ungenial seasons had greatly damaged the country; being the calamitous consequences of wickedness that occurred in his age; and which emanated from a prevalent recourse to depravity, illegality, and impious abominations. He built the church of Llanweirydd, which is now called Y Caerau, where he had a mansion, although he held his court at Cardiff."

Gweirydd was the sixth in descent from Morgan Mwynfawr, who died circa 665. He must, therefore, have lived about the latter part of the ninth century. He was succeeded by his son Arthfael.

Caerau Church, in Glamorganshire, is now dedicated to S. Mary. It goes without saying that the name Caerau (the Fortifications), by which alone the place is to-day known, is considerably older than Llanweirydd.

S. GWEN of Cornwall, Matron

GWEN, daughter of Cynyr of Caer Gawch, and sister of S. Non, was married to Solomon or Selyf, King of Cornwall, and became the mother of S. Cybi.² Nothing is recorded of her. She must have received her sister in Cornwall, and obtained for her an extensive grant of land. And she herself founded a church, now called S. Wenn. Selyf is thought to have fallen early, in Armorica, to which he had gone, as the first settlers regarded themselves as still under the rule of their princes in Britain, and made domain lands for them in their new colony, and Selyf is said to have been murdered by pagans there. But the authorities for this are untrustworthy.

A S. Gwenne or Candide is venerated in Brittany in the diocese of Vannes, but it is doubtful if this be Gwen the wife of Selyf. She is commemorated there on October 3, according to Garaby, but this is Gwen Teirbron, and his authority is not great.

¹ Pp. 12-17. Geoffrey of Monmouth mentions a Gweirydd, Bruts, pp. 94-8, who in the Latin text occurs as Arviragus. The name is met with also in the Record of Caernarvon, p. 60. For a Glamorgan aged hermit of the name, who dwelt in a cave underground, and was regarded as a sorcerer, see Sir J. Rhys, Celtic Folklore, p. 189. The name is distinct from Gwerydd.

² Hanesyn Hên, p. 109; Myv. Arch., p. 421. Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 119 gives Gwen, daughter of Tewdwr Mawr, as mother of S. Elian, but it is a misreading for Cenaf or Cena.

The Feast of S. Wenn is on October 18. Oengus in his Félire has on October 3, "Candida, a happy sun"; but Gorman has, "Candidus, a chaste man." On this day in the Roman Martyrology is Candidus, a Martyr at Rome. He does not appear in Usuardus, but in Bede's additions; and in some of the versions of the Martyrology of S. Jerome is Candida or Candidus. On the strength of this doubtful martyr, and of doubtful sex, Gwen has been given this day.

S. Gwen daughter of Cynyr has received no cult in Wales.

Dedications to her in Devon and Cornwall are:—

The parish church of S. Wenn, and that of Morval. A ruined chapel at S. Kew, and another at Hartland (Bp. Stafford's Register, 1400). At S. Wenn in S. Kew is a very early rude cross.

The parish church of S. Wenn is called Ecclesia Stæ Wennæ in the Registers of Bishop Bronescombe, 1260; Bishop Grandisson, 1329; Bishop Brantynghame, 1371.

There is an entry in William of Worcester of a S. Candida or Whyte which is a translation of the name given, at "Whyte-chyrche per (not filled in) miliaria de Cherde, et dedicata die Pentecosten," and here reposed her body.

It has been supposed that the name originates from a mistake. When the first stone churches were erected, they were whitewashed, and so acquired the names of Whitchurches. But when this practice became obsolete, then some other reason was sought to explain the name, and it was assumed that a S. White or Candida was the patroness. Whitchurch-Canonicorum, near Lyme-Regis in Dorset is placed under the two-fold dedication of S. Candida and S. Cross. There is also a Whitchurch-cum-Felton near Bristol. The existing church is dedicated to S. Gregory, but was formerly considered to have been under the patronage of S. Candida. But see what is said hereon under S. GWEN TEIRBRON.

S. Candida, a Roman martyr, was commemorated on August 29. Another Candida martyr in Africa on January 5, and another martyr also in Africa on March 9. A S. Candida martyr at Alexandria on March 21, and one of the same name at Carthage on September 20.

A S. Guen or Candida is culted at Scaër in Finistère, and it is supposed that she is identical with S. Ninoca; but this is doubtful. She is there represented as an abbess, and an abundant holy well bears her name.

S. GWEN of Talgarth, Matron

GWEN was a daughter of Brychan according to both the early and the late lists of his children.¹ She founded the church of Talgarth, in Breconshire, where, according to the *Iolo MSS.*² she was "killed by the pagan Saxons." In the Cognatio she is unmatched, but other accounts give her as the wife of Llyr Merini, and mother of Caradog Freichfras.

Clodfaith, a reputed daughter of Brychan, is also said to have been a saint at Talgarth, as well as in Emlyn.³ Browne Willis⁴ and others enter Gwendeline against Talgarth, but its true dedication is to Gwen.

S. GWEN TEIRBRON, Matron

THIS saint was the daughter of Emyr Llydaw, a grand-daughter of Aldor, an early chief in Armorica, who had his headquarters where is now Castelaudren. She was married to Eneas Lydewig, probably in Armorica, and became the mother of S. Cadfan.⁵

She was left a widow, and then married Fracan, cousin of Cador or Cado, Duke of Cornwall, and with him migrated back to Armorica. They had two children, Jacob or James and Gwethenoc; and, after arriving in Brittany, two more, Winwaloe and Cleirve.

Owing to her having been twice married, and having a family by each husband, she was called Teirbron, or the Three-breasted; and the author of the Life of S. Winwaloe, Wurdistan, states that she actually had this conformation.⁶ But there is nothing of this in the Life of her other sons, SS. James and Gwethenoc. In like manner, a woman who was thrice married, and had a family by each husband was called Four-breasted.⁷

¹ Cognatio de Brychan; Jesus College MS. 20; Cambro-British Saints, p. 270; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 140; Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 426.

² P. 120.

³ ii, p. 151.

⁴ Pavochiale Anglicanum, 1733, p. 182. Jones, in his Brecknockshire, ed. 1898, p. 473, thought it should be to Gwenfrewi, as also the church of Vaynor (supposed to be to Gwendeline), in the same county.

⁵ Myv. Arch., p. 425; Iolo MSS., p. 112. There is an account of her in Arch. Camb., 1864, pp. 40-3, where is also an illustration of the statue in the chapel of S. Venec.

⁶ "Parente eorundem (sc. Uueithnoci et Jacobi) Alba (Gwen) nomine, quæ cognominatur Trimammis, eo quod ternas, æquato numero natorum, habuit mammas." Vita Sti. Winwaloei in Cart. Landeven, p. 9.

⁷ Deirinell, mother of SS. Domangart and Mura, was called Four-Breasted, because she reared three families, a pair of breasts being allowed only to the first family.

STATUE OF GWEN TEIRBRON AND HER SONS, WINWALOE, GWETHENOC AND JAMES.

In the Chapel of S. Venec.

As related to the ruling family, she was granted tracts of land in Domnonia, one, now called Pléguen, is near Lanvollon in Goello. In the church there she is represented seated, with three breasts, a child in each arm, and another lying at her feet. The curé being somewhat ashamed of the statue has relegated it to the tower. The Pardon there is on the Sunday in the Octave of S. Anne.

She also had a settlement in Kemenet Illi, at Plouguin near Plou-dalmezeau. In the chapel of the château of Lisguen in the parish, is an altar painting representing her, and Fracan, and S. Winwaloe. Her third breast is there ingeniously disguised as a broad gold brooch. In the park are remains of a chapel of S. Winwaloe.

A third settlement was at S. Guen in Côtes du Nord, near Mur. She has, however, been abandoned as patroness for a S. Guenin, Bishop of Vannes. But that the place was originally a plou of hers would appear from there having been in the parish a chapel of S. Fracan.

Between Quimper and Châteaulin is the chapel of S. Venec, in the parish of Brasparts. In this chapel is a statue of her, three-breasted, and with her three sons by Fracan, James, Gwethenoc and Winwaloe. Also another statue, of a saint in armour, probably Cadfan, who has a chapel in the parish.

More statues of the Three-breasted Gwens existed, but they have been got rid of by the curés, who have buried them, regarding them as somewhat outrageous and not conducive to devotion.¹

Nursing mothers offer to her a distaff and flax, to secure the desired quantity of milk.

Garaby gives October 3 as the day of commemoration of S. Gwen, but see what has been said thereon in the preceding article but one. Nicolas Roscarrock gives June 1.

For further particulars see S. FRACAN.

The church of Whitchurch-Canonicorum in Dorset is dedicated to S. Candida or White; and in it is the shrine of the saint in the transept. Beneath the east window is the recessed tomb of the saint. The monument consists of two parts. The lower part is composed of an old thirteenth-century base brought from some other place and rebuilt in its present position. There are openings, three in number, beneath the tomb for the insertion of handkerchiefs, etc., to touch the shrine. On the top of this old base is a plain fourteenth-century coffin, covered with a Purbeck marble slab. This coffin was opened by the Reverend Sir William Palmer, in 1848, and found to contain a stone box in which were some bones, the supposed relics of S. Candida. The monument is locally known as the "shrine of S. Candida." In 1899 there was a dangerous settlement of the walls of the north transept owing to the sinkage of the clay soil, and in March 1900 an ominous fissure appeared. The work of underpinning the walls and putting in a foundation of cement, was carried out by the then Vicar, the Rev. Charles Druit. It was during the execution of this work that the re-discovery of the relics was made. The broken end of the coffin having been withdrawn from under the Purbeck marble slab, there was seen within the end of a leaden casket of eight inches square, and on it, cast in raised letters on the lead, was the following inscription of the twelfth or early thirteenth century:—

¹ Bulletin de la Soc. Arch. de Finistère, ii (1874-5), p. 104.

OT. Reliq̄e Sc̄e. W.

Further examination showed that the floor of the coffin was covered with dust and many fragments of bone, wood, and lead, including two perfectly sound teeth, one molar and one incisor. The reliquary itself, on being carefully drawn out, was seen to contain a large number of bones, presumably those of a small woman of about forty years of age. These were not disturbed in their resting-place, but one of the thigh bones which lay uppermost was measured, and was found to be $13\frac{7}{8}$ inches long. The larger fragments found on the floor of the coffin were placed with the rest of the bones in the reliquary, and all the smaller fragments and dust were reverently collected into a small metal box and placed within the coffin. The lead reliquary had been found torn, but on one side that was uninjured was found, cast in raised letters, the following inscription:—

✠ Hic. Reques̄t Rliq̄e, Sc̄e. Wite.

All the relics were carefully replaced in the stone coffin, the broken end being securely cemented in its place.

Now, who was this S. Candida, or White?

The Church of Whitchurch-Canonicorum was founded by King Alfred. In 919-920, Matuedoi, Count of Poher, "cum ingenti multitudine Britonum," fled from Brittany to England, carrying with them the relics of their saints. They were kindly received by Athelstan, who was not then king, and he located them in various places, mainly, probably, on the south coast and in Cornwall, where they might be among those speaking the same tongue. At Wareham in Dorset have been found inscribed stones bearing British names, but in a Breton form, and similar, if not identical, with forms found in Breton cartularies of the ninth and tenth centuries. It has been conjectured that these are monuments of some of these Breton refugees.¹

¹ McClure, British Place-names, S.P.C.K., 1910, p. 161.

Now we know that Athelstan gave relics of various Breton saints to churches in Wessex, and it is by no means unlikely that he thus endowed the church of Whitchurch, founded by his grandfather, with the bones of S. Gwen, the mother of such illustrious saints as S. Cadfan and S. Winwaloe, and which the Breton refugees would certainly carry away with them to save them from the depredations of the Northmen. Athelstan might be the more led to give the body of S. Gwen to Whitchurch, because of the name, Gwen being white in English. In Brittany she is variously called S. Candide and S. Blanche. According to the legend there told, she was carried off by English pirates to London, but she climbed down the side of the ship and walked back to Brittany over the water, but not till one of the pirates with an axe had chopped off two of her fingers.¹ In the legend she is not regarded as a virgin, but as a mother of several sons. In the legend there is manifest confusion. There is a reminiscence of the pirates, but she is made to be carried off by them, instead of her body being taken away from them. And she is represented as conveyed to England; which probably was true of her body. On the Church of Whitchurch are sculptured representations of a ship, a pike, and an axe, as well as of the water-avens, and conceivably the ship and pike may bear some reference to the pirates, and the axe to the mutilation of her hand in the popular legend, whilst the water-avens would symbolise her name.

What helps to make the conjecture more probable, that the Candida of Whitchurch is S. Gwen Teirbron, is that Scaër, the church of which is dedicated to her under the name of Candida, was in the county of Poher.

S. GWENABWY, Matron

GWENABWY or Gwenafwy was one of the reputed daughters of Caw, and is said to have a church dedicated to her in Anglesey, where she lies buried.² No church is dedicated to her in Anglesey or Wales to-day; but we may probably regard her as the foundress of Gwennap in Cornwall, which has as patroness S. Weneppa. Bishop Bronescombe's Register, 1226, gives, "Ecclesia Sanctæ Weneppæ." So also in the Taxation of Pope Nicolas IV, 1288-91, and the Registers of Bishop Grandisson, 1342, 1349, Bishop Stapeldon, 1310, and Bishop Brantyngham, 1377, 1392.

¹ Sébillot (P.), Petite Légende Dorée de la Haute-Bretagne, Nantes, 1897.

² Peniarth MS. 75; Iolo MSS., pp. 117, 143. The second element of the name, -pui, mutated into -bui, -bwy, occurring also in Guorapui (-abui), Gwernabwy, Junabui (Latinized Junapeius), Rhonabwy, etc., is the Early Goidelic genitive poi, "of a son, or boy, or descendant." Sir J. Rhys, Celtae and Galli, 1905, p. 43.

If the S. Winnow on the Foye River be a foundation of Gwynog, son of Gildas, which is uncertain, then Gwenabwy had a nephew in Cornwall. What is more certain is that she had there her great-nephews, Ffili and Eval. According to the story of Culhwch and Olwen she was married to Llwydneu, son of Nwython, and had a son, Gwydre, whom "Huail his uncle stabbed; and there was hatred between Huail and Arthur because of the wound."¹

Gwenabwy was also the name of a chieftain, the son of Gwên, who figures in the Gododin. "Equal to twelve" was he. Gwynabwy occurs as a lay witness in the Book of Llan Dâu.²

S. GWENAEL, Abbot, Confessor

ALTHOUGH Gwenael is a Saint only doubtfully known in Wales, yet he has left faint traces of his presence in Cornwall, and we know from his Life that he spent some years in Britain and in Ireland, where he is said to have founded two monasteries. It is accordingly advisable to give an account of him.

The authorities for his story are as follows:—

1. A Life composed in the tenth century, before the translation of his body to Paris under Hugh Capet, about the year 950. Of this two MSS. are extant, one in the Bibliothèque royale at Brussels, No. 8,931, the other, divided into nine Lectons was in the Library at Corbeil, but is now lost, yet a copy exists made by John Baptist Macculdus, S.J., in 1635.

This Life has been published by the Bollandists, Acta SS. Nov. 3, I, pp. 674-8.

2. A second Life by Guido de Castris, Abbot of S. Denys, in the thirteenth century, published by Menardus, lib. ii, p. 368.

3. A life by Albert le Grand in his Vies des Saints Bretons, derived from the Breviaries of Léon, Vannes and Quimper. He also used the Life composed in the tenth century.

Gwenael was son of Romelius, Count (comes) in Brittany, and of Letitia his wife. At his baptism he was given his name, which signifies "The White Angel." One day, when Gwenael was quite a child, S. Winwaloe accompanied Romelius on his way from one of his cells to his abbey of Landevennec. Albert le Grand says that the place was Quimper, and that Winwaloe had come there to visit S. Corentine, but this is wholly unsupported by the texts we possess.

¹ Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 109.

² P. 122.

Something bright and pleasant in the face of the little lad attracted Winwaloe's attention, and he said to him, "Would you like, my boy, to follow me to my monastery and there serve God continually?"

"I would desire nothing better," answered the child, and without a word to his parents, he followed the Abbot to Landevennec.

Albert le Grand gives fuller details, which we have quoted in the Life of S. Winwaloe. Albert says that Gwenael was seven years old when he went to Landevennec, and that he remained there three years before he was invested with the monastic habit, and he was forty-three years in Landevennec before Winwaloe died. There is nothing of this in the Vita 1^{ma}, but we cannot suppose that Albert le Grand invented these very precise statements. He was a conscientious compiler; he added flourishes of his own, but did not manufacture facts.¹

The Vita 1^{ma} says that when Winwaloe was dying, his monks urged him to nominate a successor, and he indicated Gwenael as the most suitable to fill his room. The early Life, on the contrary, implies that Gwenael was scarcely out of his noviciate when appointed abbot.² This is incredible, and we are more disposed to accept the statement of le Grand based on some text that has not come down to us.

Gwenael remained in charge of Landevennec for seven years,³ and then he betook himself to Britain and to Ireland, attended by twelve monks. He founded one large monastery in Britain, and another in Ireland, and fifty congregations of pious men placed themselves under his direction.⁴ At last he resolved on returning, after four years spent in Britain and Ireland,⁵ and he took back with him fifty monks.

¹ He relied on the Quimper Breviary. "Vix septennis," say the Vannes Breviary and that of Quimper. "Decennis habitum religionis indutus," Brev. Quimper.

² "Beatus Guenailus in his verbis aggressus est: Quo sensu, pater, qua ratione, quo consilio, maturis juvenem sapientibus imprudentem, exercitatis neophytum et rudem vis præponere? Necdum subesse didici, et præesse jam cogor; necdum monachum feci, et in abbatem eligor? Imbecillibus humeris imponitur regiminis onus, cui frequentissime succumbunt ipsi fortiores?" Vita 1^{ma}, Acta SS. Nov. i, p. 675.

³ "Septem annos integros . . . præfuit." Ibid.; and again, "Septem annis expletis . . . disgreiens."

⁴ "Monasteria duo, alterum in Britannia, alterum in Scotia construxit." "Quinquaginta cœnobiolorum conventus . . . patrociniò famuli Dei sese commiserunt." Ibid., p. 676.

⁵ Albert le Grand.

Gwenael arrived in Cornubia (Cornouaille) in the reign of Rigomalus, who received him and his monks favourably.

Rigomalus looks like a tenth-century version of Rigmael; but no such prince is known. There was a Righael or Rivol, who was the murderer of his brother Meliau and of his nephew Melor, and the Life in Albert le Grand calls him by the name. The author of Vita 1^{ma} calls this prince, "Vir honestate, justitiaque præclarus, qui et eandem (Cornubiam) tam moribus quam legibus venustavit."

But hagiographers painted princes in fair colours if they were large benefactors, and blackened them if otherwise, regardless of their moral qualities. It is, however, reasonable to set down this laudation of Rivol to the ignorance of the biographer, who added the flourish to fill out a sentence, concluding that the prince was all that could have been desired because he received Gwenael well.

In Cornubia the saint now founded three monasteries, after which he departed to the Isle of Groix, where he remained for several years and made monastic settlements on it.

Again a spirit of restlessness came over him, and he left the island and settled on the mainland in the county of Vannes, where he drove away a wolf with her cubs, and elicited a spring of water.

Once, when on his way to the monastery of "Chaloteti," a stag that was being pursued fled for protection to him from the hunters, and this led to a meeting with Count Weroc, who forthwith made to him a grant of two villis.

At length, full of days, and worn with labours, Gwenael died on November 3.

We find a different account of his movements in Albert le Grand.

On leaving Britain, Gwenael and his party landed on the Isle of Groix, and not after a course of foundation-making in Cornubia, as the first biographer intimates.

He did not remain some years on the isle, but a few days only, and then went on by boat to Landevennec, where he was received with great joy,¹ and where he remained for the space of three years.²

Then only did he visit Rivol or Rualo³ as called in the Breviary lessons, and remained in Cornubia for some—as we learn by the sequel—six years, and after that migrated into the territory of Vannes.

¹ "Hinc ad suum cœnobium perrexit, ubi incredibili omnium religiosorum lætitia exceptus est." Brev. Quimper.

² "Monasterium Landevenecense, cui sex restituit, triennio . . . inhabitant." Ibid.

³ "Hinc ad locum Corisopitensis agri desertum profectus, novum in territorio, a comite Rualone dato, monasterium crexit." Ibid.

He had not been there nine months before he encountered Weroc the Count, who made a grant of lands to him. Then he returned to Landevennec, and remained there for four years till his death, which took place when he was seventy-five according to one account, seventy according to another.¹

It will be seen that there is a precision as to dates of his life which lacks in the Vita 1^{ma}, and that the order of events is reasonable and probable, whereas that in the First Life is quite unmeaning. This latter does not make Gwenael return to Landevennec at all after his return from Britain and Ireland. In the Vita 2^{da} we have him make this abbey his headquarters from which he undertakes diversions so as to secure fresh sites for cells to his monastery.

The Vita 1^{ma} seems to have been composed by some one unacquainted with the localities, and who was furnished with scraps of biographical matter that were not in chronological order. He makes his hero found several monasteries in the Isle of Groix, which is six miles long and two broad, and which could not have supported so many similar institutions. Where "Chaloteti" can be, it is perhaps vain to ask. The biographer blundered over a name which he did not understand, or misread.

He avoids precise statements as to the periods in the Life of Gwenael, such as are given with much exactitude in the Vita 2^{da}, and he is also vague as to the localities where he settled temporarily. On the other hand, he makes up for exact historical matter by much rhetorical adornment, a common trick with biographers deficient in matter.

The Life by Albert Le Grand, based on the Acts in the Breviaries, seems to us a far more reliable guide than that printed in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists.

The chronology of Gwenael's Life according to the Vita 2^{da} is as follows:—

Gwenael, aged seven, follows Winwaloe.
Assumes the habit	aged 10 years.
Becomes abbot at the age of	50 "
Departs for Britain	aged 57 "
Returns to Landevennec	" 61 "
Retires to a solitude in Cornubia	" 64 "
Leaves for Vannes	" 70 "
Returns to Landevennec	" 71 "
Dies	" 75 "

But when we come to fix the dates we encounter numerous difficulties.

¹ Kerdanet's note to Albert le Grand, ed. 1837.

Three years after his return from Britain, he is brought into relations with Rivol, Prince of Cornouaille. The date of this prince is given with some approach to exactitude by De la Borderie as 538-544.

When aged seventy, he goes into the territory of Vannes, where he meets with the Count Weroc who makes to him a grant of lands.

There were two of the name, the elder died in 550 as nearly as can be judged. He was at once succeeded by his son Canao, who murdered three of his brothers, and would have murdered a fourth, Macliau, but for the interposition of S. Felix, Bishop of Nantes. Macliau swore to submit to his brother, then broke his oath, raised a party, took up arms, was defeated by Canao, and fled for refuge to Conmore, Regent of Domnonia. Canao fell in 560, but before that, Macliau had slipped into the city of Vannes, got himself elected and consecrated Bishop, and maintained himself there in defiance of his brother.

On the death of Canao, Macliau seized on the county, and ruled Broweroc as Count and Vannes as Bishop. He was killed in 577 and then his son Weroc II succeeded and ruled till about 594.

Consequently, if we take 544 as the date when Gwenael received grants from Rivol, we have 550 as the date when he encountered Weroc, but this cannot have been Weroc I, who died about this date; and Weroc II was not count till twenty-seven years later. This presents a difficulty that can only be got over by supposing that Macliau had his domain about the place where Gwenael settled, and that his son as a youth hunted there and met the saint and prevailed on his father to concede to the saint certain trefs; that this took place during the temporary reconciliation between Macliau and Canao, and that, further, the biographer has given to Weroc the title of Count before he had any right to it.

That this assumption is not destitute of probability may be gathered from the precipitate return of Gwenael to Landevennec shortly after having received the promise of the two estates. We might have expected that he would have remained in Broweroc to consolidate his foundation there; instead of that, he remained in the district in all but nine months and left it never to go there again. Hostilities broke out between Macliau and Canao immediately after the donation had been made. Macliau was defeated and fled for his life, and any grant he or his son had made was no longer effective. But later, after Canao's death and that of Gwenael, the disciples of the saint probably reminded Weroc of his undertaking, and when he actually was Count, he may have confirmed it to the representatives of Gwenael; and thus, the biographer was led to antedate his title.

We come next to a much more difficult problem, that concerning the date of the death of Winwaloe, and the succession of Gwenael to the abbacy of Landevennec.

Winwaloe died on Wednesday in the first week in Lent, which fell that year on March 3.¹

The fast of Lent among the Celts began, as in the Church of Milan, not on Ash Wednesday, but on the Monday after the First Sunday.² Moreover, had Wurdistan, the biographer of Winwaloe, meant Ash Wednesday, he would have said, "Wednesday, the first day of Lent," and not, "March 3, the fourth day in the first week of Lent."

We might suppose that in the sixth century, the Church in Armorica observed the Celtic computation and not the Roman. Now by the Celtic reckoning, the only years in which Easter Day fell on April 11, and Wednesday in the first week in Lent on March 3, were 499, 583 and 594. The first date is too early, and the others too late.

But did the Church in Brittany in the sixth century observe the Celtic reckoning for Easter? It is true that many Celtic usages remained in force in that Church till late. In 818 the Emperor Louis the Pious, having defeated Morvan, the Breton prince, received Matmonoc, abbot of Landevennec, and inquired of him what were the peculiar customs in the Breton monasteries. The abbot informed him that they followed the usages of the Scots or Irish. Thereupon Louis issued an order addressed to all the monasteries in Brittany, requiring the abandonment of the Celtic tonsure, and such other customs as were peculiar, and the acceptance of the rule of S. Benedict.³

¹ Sanctus ergo Wingularoelus . . . quinto nonas Martias, quarta feria in prima quadragesimæ hebdomada integer et corpore et mente obiit." Vita S. Winwaloei auct. Wurdistan, Anal. Boll. T. vii (1888), pp. 248-9.

² The four days before the first Sunday in Lent were not added to the fast of Lent till after the time of Gregory the Great, at the close of the sixth century. In his sixteenth Homily on the Gospels, he says: "There are from this day (the first Sunday in Lent) to the joyous feast of Easter, six weeks, that is, forty-two days. As we do not fast on the six Sundays, there are but thirty-six fasting days . . . which we offer to God as the tithe of the year." But from the sixth century on, sporadically the four days were added, here and there in the Western Church, but their observance as part of the fast of Lent was not made obligatory till Urban II in the Council of Beneventum, 1091, enjoined their observance. They never have been, and are not to this day, observed in the Church of Milan. The alteration was not made in Scotland till Margaret, a Saxon princess, married to King Malcolm III, A.D. 1069, promoted a religious change, to bring the Scottish Church into uniformity with that of Rome. Warren, The Liturgy of the Celtic Church, London, 1881, p. 7; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen Lexikon, 1886, iv, p. 1,261; Dom Gueranger, The Liturgical Year (trs. L. Shepherd), Dublin, 1876, Septuagesima, p. 2.

³ "Hludowicus imperator Augustus omnibus episcopis et universo ordini ecclesiastico Britannia . . . cognoscentes quomodo ab Scotis sive de conversatione sive de tonsione capitum accepissent dum ordo totius sanctæ apostolicæ atque Romanæ Ecclesiæ aliter se habere dinoscitur . . . Et ideo jussimus ut et

The ordinance is remarkable in this, that it does not mention and make a point of the observance of Easter at a different time from the Franko-Roman Church, which it certainly would have done had the Breton Church varied from the Latin in this particular, at the time.

Further, it is noticeable that there is absolutely no trace of controversy on this burning question, which agitated men's minds and excited such strong feeling in England, Wales and Ireland. This must have been due to the acquiescence, at an early period, of the Breton Church in the revised computation followed by the Frank Church.¹

When we consider the intimate relations in which the Breton saints were with the Frank princes and bishops, we may be confident that the question as to the time when Easter was to be celebrated was not a mooted point between them. S. Albinus, a native of Broweroc, became Bishop of Angers, beyond the Breton pale; S. Samson of Dol had a monastery, Penitale in the diocese of Paris, and he was on the most intimate terms with its bishop, Germanus; the position would have been strained had they observed Easter at different times. Nantes, Rennes, Vannes were in a country overflowed by British colonists; in these anciently established dioceses the Roman computation was observed, but we hear of no jar on account of the colonists observing the Paschal solemnity at a different time. Paul of Léon visited Childebert at Paris to receive confirmation of the grant of land made to him by Count Withur of Léon. Childebert consented on condition that Paul was consecrated bishop; we may be sure he would have insisted as well on conformity to the Roman usage with regard to the celebration of Easter. It would accordingly appear most probable that the Breton Church from the first acquiesced in the change.

The impossibility of making Winwaloe's death agree with the Celtic computation renders it certain that this was so at Landevennec. The Roman Easter, in the sixth century, fell on April 11, in the years 510, 521, 532; and the last of these is the only date that can be reconciled with the particulars as given in the Life of Gwenael. We are now able to determine the dates in this Life with some approach to accuracy.

S. Gwenael was born in the year	482
He followed Winwaloe to Landevennec	489

juxta regulam Sti. Benedicti patris viverent, et de tonsura capitis juxta taxatum modum cum sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ . . . concordent unitate." Cart. Land., ed. De la Borderie, Rennes, 1888, pp. 75-6.

¹ "Leur contact avec l'église gallo-franke puissamment organisée parait avoir de bonne heure modifié ces coutumes spéciales, du moins sur le point le plus essentiel, l'époque de la célébration de la Pâque. Il n'y eut jamais à cet égard de dissidence entre les Bretons de l'Armorique et leurs voisins de la Gaule, du moins, on n'en trouve nulle trace." De la Borderie, Hist. de Bretagne, ii. p. 264.

He received the monastic habit, aged ten	492
S. Winwaloe died, and Gwenael succeeded as abbot	532
Gwenael departed for Britain and Ireland	539
After four years absence he returned	543
Made foundations in Cornubia	546
Departed for Broweroc, where he remained nine months.	552
Returned the same or succeeding year to Landevennec	553
Died at Landevennec, aged seventy-five	557

We will now consider the various epochs in the life of Gwenael in more detail.

He was a native of Languenoc in the parish of Lanrivoaré in Léon. This we learn from one of the charters of the Cartulary of Landevennec which calls Languenoc, "Hereditas Sancti Uuenhaeli, qui primus post Sanctum Uingualoeum abbas fuit" (No. 39). A local tradition, however, makes Ergué-Gaberic near Quimper the place where he was born. Such a tradition is not, perhaps, worth very much, but it is possible enough that, though his patrimony may have been in Léon he may have been born elsewhere. Languenoc is now Lanvenec on a confluent of the river Aber Ildut, that takes its name from S. Illtyd.

We may dismiss the story in Vita 1^{ma} that Gwenael was appointed abbot whilst a boy in his teens, and accept that of Vita 2^{da} which states that he had been an inmate of the abbey of Landevennec for forty-three years when Winwaloe died, and that he succeeded him as abbot. He remained in that monastery for seven years and then went about in Cornubia founding churches. Landevennec at the time was probably included in the County of Poucaer, of which Conmore was chief, though owing some sort of allegiance to the King of Cornubia. Grallo, who had favoured Winwaloe, died, according to De la Borderie, between 475 and 505; according to Dom Plaine, between 500 and 520.¹

The history of the period that ensues is confused. The Cartularies of Landevennec and Quimper and Quimperlé give as his successors, Daniel Dremrud, and then Budic and Maxenri, two brothers. But from the Life of S. Melor we find that his father Meliau was king for seven years till assassinated by his brother Rivol. It is not however clear that this was in Cornubia and not in Léon. Rivol usurped authority, however, in Cornubia, and he occurs in the Life of Gwenael as a favourer of the saint. There is no mention of any prince in the Life of Gwenael before his meeting with Rivol.

Before that he had gone, in 539, to Britain and Ireland, where he founded two monasteries, and undertook the supervision of fifty others. There are no traces of Gwenael's work left in Ireland, but in Wales is

¹ Dom Plaine, Grallon le Grand.

S. Twinells, a corruption of S. Winells, the prosthetic t belonging to the word "Saint." William of Worcester says of the place and saint, "Sanctus Wymocus (sic) Anglice Seynt Wynelle, confessor, distat a Pembroke per 11 miliaria."¹ In the Taxatio of 1291, p. 275, col. 2, the church appears as Ecclesia Sancti Winnoci," and in the Valor of 1535² as "Vicaria de Sancto Wynoco."

We should be inclined to accept the popular name, rather than that given in the official documents, the writers of which may have been guided by their acquaintance with the more famous S. Winoc, and have supposed that Winel was a corruption of that name. Phonetically it is not possible to deduce Winel from Winoc.

In Cornwall there is also a S. Wynol, a chapel in the parish of S. Germans. There were Winwaloe settlements in Devon and Cornwall, probably affiliated to Landevennec, and it is probable that these are the establishments over which Gwenael exercised some supervision.

On his return from Britain, Gwenael landed in the Isle of Groix, where, however, he remained but a few days, and then by boat went to Landevennec, where he was joyfully received. After three years exercising the office of abbot, he went, in 546, into Cornouaille to found subsidiary houses and cells. There it was that he was so favourably received by Rivol. In the Cartulary of Landevennec are no charters bearing that prince's name, as a donor of land to the abbey, but there are several grants made by Budic. This prince had been driven into Wales by a dynastic quarrel. Probably he and Meliau were grandsons of Grallo, and in the struggle for the mastery Meliau got the upper hand and Budic was expelled.

According to the Life of S. Oudoceus, Budic, a native of Cornugallia or Armorican Cornubia, was forced to leave his country, and he took refuge in Dyfed where he married Anaumed, sister of S. Teilo. After a while messages from his principality announced the death of the usurper, and they invited him to return. This he did, and his son Oudoceus was born in Armorica. The return of Budic was after the death of Rivol about 544 or 545, which is about the time when, according to the Life of S. Gwenael, that saint had relations with Rivol. It is possible that these relations began with the usurper and continued with Budic, who certainly made grants to Landevennec.

In, or about, 552 Gwenael went into Broweroc. What his foundations were in Cornouaille can only be conjectured. He is patron of Ergué-Gaberic where he is supposed to have been born, of Bolazec near Huelgoat, and of Plougonvelen near S. Rénan in Léon, and these may represent his settlements during the years 546-552. The activity shown at this period points to Landevennec having somewhat declined in importance and in recruits, and to his having endeavoured by the formation of branch houses to supply the mother-house with additional members. It was apparently for the same purpose that he essayed his fortunes in Broweroc.

¹ Itin., p. 163.

² iv, p. 384.

There he settled in the present parish of Caudan, near Lorient, on a creek of the river Blavet. Here, at Locunel (Locus S. Gwenaeli) he met with Weroc son of Meliau. Near the chapel is a lech, or early Christian tombstone. On the other side of the water is a chapel of S. Gwenael and near it another lech.

In later times, after the devastation by the Northmen, and the restoration after their expulsion, it became a priory under S. Gildas de Rhuis.

The saintly abbot died at Landevennec and was buried there, but in 857 Nominoe visited the abbey, and carried off the body of Gwenael to Vannes, and it was laid on the epistle side of the choir.

In 913 or 914 the Northmen destroyed Landevennec and ravaged the whole coast. The body of Gwenael was transferred for safety to Corbeil near Paris, where it was torn from its shrine and burnt at the Revolution.

In Brittany Gwenael is variously called Guinel, and Vinol and Wynol.

The churches of which he is patron have been already named. At Tréguidel in Côtes du Nord is a late seventeenth-century statue of him in the chapel of S. Pabu, representing him mitred, with cope and stole, and arms extended; one formerly held a crosier. At Plougouvenen is a retable, on which Gwenael is represented as a monk, and Count Weroc, with plumed hat and arquebuse, approaches him.

At Pouldergat is his Holy Well, that is much frequented by such as suffer from rheumatism.

He has and had numerous chapels in Finistère and Morbihan.

His Pardons are on the Monday in Whitsun week, and on the last Sundays in August and November.

The day of S. Gwenael is, however, November 3. Albert le Grand, MS. Missal of Tréguier, fifteenth century, Brev. Corisop., 1701, 1789; but transferred to November 9, Brev. Corisop., 1835, Brev. Venet., 1589, Miss. Venet., 1530; Brev. Léon, 1516.

He occurs in Whytford as Gwenady. In the Auctuaria Usuardi as Guinaldi.

S. GWENAN, Virgin

THE authorities for this saint are quite late.¹ They represent her to be the daughter of Brynach Wyddel by Corth or Cymorth, a supposed daughter of Brychan. Brynach was Brychan's confessor, and he had two other daughters, Mwynen or Mwynwen and Gwenlliw.

Gwenan was the name borne by King Arthur's favourite ship, which was wrecked in Bardsey race or sound, between that isle and the mainland, whence called Cas Wenan, Gwenan's Aversion.²

S. GWENASEDD, Matron

GWENASEDD, or Gwenaseth, is entered in the *Iolo MSS.*³ among the Welsh Saints. She was the daughter of Rhiain or Rhain of Rrheinwg, according to the oldest copies of Bonedd y Saint, but according to the late pedigrees, of Rhufawn, otherwise Rhun Hael, the son of Cunedda Wledig, who, on the partition of Wales after the expulsion of the Goidels by the Sons of Cunedda, received as his share the cantref of Rhufoniog (called after him), in North Denbighshire. She was the wife of Sawyl Benisel (incorrectly Benuchel), the son of Pabo Post Prydyn, by whom she became the mother of S. Asaph.⁴ No churches are known to be dedicated to her; in fact, the authority for her as a saint is of the feeblest.

The form Guynnassed, or Gwynasedd, also occurs, and a district name, Lleudir Gwynasedd, which was situated "where the Lliw enters the Lluchwr," i.e., near Loughor, in Gower.⁵ The name seems to mean "White-spear."

¹ Iolo MSS., pp. 121, 141; Myv. Arch., p. 428. The name of Gildas's son Gwynog, is wrongly spelt Guenan in Hafod MS. 16 (Myv. Arch., p. 416). For the Carnarvonshire legend of Gwenan, one of the three sisters of Arianrhod, see Sir J. Rhys, Celtic Folklore, pp. 207-10. The Breton equivalent Guenan occurs in Lanvenan (Finistère) and Penvenan (Côtes-du-Nord).

² Additional MSS. 14,866, and 14,903; cf. Peniarth MS. 216, p. 59.

³ P. 125, but she is wrongly made to be the wife of Pabo.

⁴ Harleian MS. 3859; Peniarth MSS., 12, 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16; Hanesyn Hên, p. 113; Cambro-British Saints, p. 266; Myv. Arch., pp. 417-8; Iolo MSS., p. 122, 128. Probably the Rhufawn who gave his name to Rhufoniog was not a son of Cunedda.

⁵ Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, pp. 32, 95.

S. GWENDDOLEU

THE Iolo MSS. include Gwenddoleu, the son of Ceidio ab Arthwys, as well as his two brothers, Nudd and Cof, among the Welsh saints, and add that they were saints of Bangor Illtyd, at Llantwit.¹ But there is no ground whatever for regarding Gwenddoleu as a Welsh saint; he was simply a warrior, and fell at the battle of Arderydd, now Arthuret in Liddesdale, in 573. According to the Triads he was head of one of the three "Faithful Hosts of Britain," and his men maintained the war at Arderydd for six weeks after he was slain.² In another Triad he is designated one of the three "Battle-bulls of Britain."³

At Arthuret are a place and stream called Carwinlaw or Carwinelow, and in the mediaeval surveys of the Forest of Liddel, Caerwyndlo.⁴ The name is that of the stronghold Caer Wenddoleu, called after this chieftain.

S. GWENDDYDD

GWENDDYDD was one of the reputed daughters of Brychan. Her name does not occur in the Cognatio de Brychan, only in the late lists of his children.⁵ She is said to have been a saint at Towyn, in Merionethshire; ⁶ but the same is also said of her sister Gwawrddydd, which leads one to suppose that the same saint is intended, and both names bear rather similar meanings—the morning star and the dawn. Another daughter of Brychan, Cerdech, is associated with Towyn in the Cognatio. See under the two names.

In Peniarth MS. 178 (sixteenth century), p. 24, it is stated that she was the wife of Cynfor, and mother of, among others, Cadell Deyrnllwg and Brochwel Ysgythrog; but this confuses her with another daughter of Brychan, Tudgliid, the wife of Cyngen ab Cynfor Cadgathwg, and mother of Cadell and others.

¹ Pp. 106, 128; cf. Bonedd Gwyr y Gogledd (Peniarth MS. 45).

² Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 305.

³ Myv. Arch., p. 389. For a "saying" attributed to him, see ibid., p. 130. His chessboard was one of the Thirteen Treasures of Britain.

⁴ Bye-Gones, 1889-90, p. 483; Skene, Four Ancient Books, i, p. 66.

⁵ Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 120; Harleian MS. 4181, f. 26b (but omitted as printed in Cambro-British Saints, p. 271, no. 65); Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 425; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 120, 140.

⁶ Peniarth MSS. 131 (fifteenth century) and 75 (sixteenth century).

No churches are mentioned as being dedicated to her, but Capel Gwenddydd was one of the now extinct pilgrimage chapels in the parish of Nevern, Pembrokeshire, that were used for solemn processions on Holy Days.¹

There was also a Gwenddydd, the sister of Myrddin.

S. GWENFAEL

IN the *Iolo MSS.*² is entered, without pedigree, Gwenfael as a saint in Brecknockshire. It is not stated what church the saint is intended to be patron of, but we suspect it is Llanllywenfel (Peniarth MS. 147), in the cantref of Buallt, now generally spelt Llanlleonfel. The church to-day is not given any dedication.

The name Gwenfael or Gwynfael occurs on two early inscribed stones, the one in South Wales and the other in North Wales. (1) "Vendumagli Hic Jacit," at Llanillterne, near Llandaff; and (2) "Vinnemagli Fili Senemagli," at Gwytherin, Denbighshire.³ It is not impossible that the name Gwenfyl or Gwenful, borne by a reputed daughter of Brychan, may be the same as Gwenfael.

There is a parish called Loquenvel, i.e. Loc-Guenvel, in Côtes du Nord, Brittany.

S. GWENFAEN, Virgin

GWENFAEN was the daughter of Paul Hên, variously said to be "of Manaw"—by which, no doubt, is meant the Manaw on the Firth of Forth—and "of the North." Her brothers were Peulan, the patron of Llanbeulan in Anglesey, and Gwyngeneu, to whom was dedicated the now extinct Capel Gwyngeneu in Holyhead parish.⁴

The only dedication to Gwenfaen is the church, formerly called Llanwenfaen, but now Rhoscolyn, in Anglesey, near the foundations of her two brothers. The site of her original church is still pointed out.

¹ Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, p. 509.

² P. 144.

³ Sir J. Rhys, Welsh Philology, 1879, pp. 372, 385.

⁴ Peniarth MS. 75 ("Pevl Hen o Vanaw"); Myv. Arch., pp. 426, 429. Their mother is said to have been "Angad Coleion," which looks like a corruption of the "(Bod) Angharad in Coleigion (or Coleion)," near Ruthin, of the Hafod Bonedd (Myv. Arch., p. 416, Cambro-British Saints, p. 268). See ii, p. 201.

Nothing is known of her history. Her Holy Well still exists on Rhoscolyn Head, in form oblong, after the fashion of a bath, and is constructed of slabs of stone, and is roughly paved. The water is about four feet below the present level of the surrounding ground. At the western end the walling is cut through by a small aperture, through which the bather passed down a flight of three steps into the water. Two triangular seats have been let into each corner of this western end for waiting devotees, and are still in situ. The well chamber does not appear to have been covered over. The water flows in from a spring outside the eastern end of the bath, and escapes by a small conduit beneath one of the steps at the western end. It is received in a small artificial basin, after filling which, it loses itself in the sea at a spot called Porth y Saint, "the Saints' Haven."

Lewis Morris, the well-known antiquary of the eighteenth century, resided for some years at Holyhead, and in one of his poems he mentions this well, and from it we learn that it was used as a charm against mental disorders, and two white spar pebbles were cast in as an oblation, or perhaps for the sake of divination.¹

Gwenfaen's Festival occurs on November 4 in the Calendar in Peniarth MS. 186, and on the 5th in that in John Edwards of Chirkland's Grammar, 1481 (Sċē Gwenvavn). The latter day is also given by Browne Willis² and Nicolas Owen.³ A Gwenfoe occurs in the Iolo MSS. calendar on November 3. Gwenfo (Peniarth MS. 147, Cardiff MS. 14), is the name of a parish known now as Wenvoe (S. Mary), near Cardiff.

S. GWENFREWI, or WINEFRED, Virgin, Martyr

THE authorities for the Life of this saint are not of a good quality. She died in the seventh century, and the earliest Life of her that exists is the anonymous Vita Sanctæ Wenefredæ in the Cotton MS. in the British Museum, Claudius A. v. (of the end of the twelfth century), published rather inaccurately by Rees in the Cambro-British Saints, pp. 198-209, and correctly by the Bollandists in the Acta Sanctorum, November 3, i, pp. 702-8.

This Life has an appendix of miracles, certainly not earlier than the twelfth century; but the Life itself may be somewhat earlier.

¹ Edward Owen, "Holyhead Antiquities," in North Wales Chronicle, September 19, 1903.

² Survey of Bangor, 1721, p. 279.

³ Hist. Anglesey, 1775, p. 58.

The appendix speaks of the time "post expulsionem Francorum a tota Venedotia," which refers to the driving of the Normans out of Gwynedd in 1135.

This Life was very probably written by a monk of the neighbouring monastery of Basingwerk. It speaks of her body as being still at Gwytherin.

The Vita 2^{da}, by Robert, Prior of Shrewsbury, was written some time between 1140 and 1167, when he died. Of this three MS. copies exist, one in the Bodleian Library, Laud Miscell. 114 (possibly the original); a second in Trinity College Library, Cambridge, O.4.42; and a third in the Royal Library, Brussels, 8072, which was formerly in the Bodleian. From these it has been printed in the Acta SS. of the Bollandists, November 3, i, pp. 708-26.

Robert had not seen the first Life, as is evident from his prologue. He drew his material partly from written matter that came into his hands, and partly from oral tradition. In dedicating his work to Guarin, abbot of Worcester, he says, "Tibi nuperimam digestam beatæ virginis Wenefredæ vitam direxi, quam partim per schedulas in ecclesiis patriæ in qua deguisse cognoscitur collegi, partim quorundam sacerdotum relationibus addidici, quos et antiquitas veneranda commendabat et quorum verbis fidem adhibere ipse religionis habitus compellebat." He probably means by the written material the Legendaria of the churches of Basingwerk and Gwytherin. His is much the fuller Life; but the facts in both are few, and are, especially in Robert's, mixed up with much frothy declamation and exhortation.

All later Lives are worthless, as a metrical story of her by Peter Langtoft, ed. Hearne, i, p. cxcvi, and reprinted in Analecta Bollandiana, vi, p. 305; and a condensation of the Life by Robert and the Vita 1^{ma} by John of Tynemouth (in Cotton MS. Tiberius E. i), printed in Capgrave's Nova Legenda Angliæ.

The Lyfe of St. Wenefreide, written in 1401, is from the Vita 1^{ma}, at least mainly. A version of the Vita 2^{da}, with amplifications of no value, was published "permissu superiorum" in 1635, at S. Omer, by J(ohn) F(alconer), S.J., and republished, with some hostile comments, by William Fleetwood, Bishop of S. Asaph (London, 1713).

The nine Lections in the Sarum Breviary were taken, almost word for word, from the Life by Robert of Shrewsbury.

There is mention of S. Winefred, and an abstract of her story, in the fourteenth century Buchedd Beuno.¹ It does not appear to be derived from either of the Latin Lives.

¹ Llyvyr Agkyr Llandewivrewi, ed. J. Morris Jones and Rhys, 1894, pp. 122-3; Cambro-British Saints, pp. 16-17.

Several copies of her Life in Welsh exist: e.g., in Peniarth MS 27, part ii (fifteenth century), and Llanstephan MS: 34 (sixteenth century). They appear to be translations, in part at any rate, of the Life by Prior Robert. The Franciscan friar and bard, Tudur Aled (flor. c. 1480-1530), wrote a cywydd in her honour,¹ in which her legend and posthumous miracles are set forth. There is another short cywydd, sometimes attributed to Iolo Goch, Glyndwr's laureate;² and another by Ieuan Brydydd Hir in Panton MS. 42.

There is no reference to her in Bede, William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Florence of Worcester, Matthew of Westminster, or, in fact, in any of the early English historians. Bede was profoundly ignorant of British matters, and that the later writers should not allude to her, mainly concerned as they were with English history, is not surprising.

What is more difficult to account for is the silence of Nennius, Geoffrey of Monmouth, and Giraldus Cambrensis. But Nennius says nothing, or next to nothing, about ecclesiastical matters. Geoffrey of Monmouth was not Bishop of S. Asaph till after he had published his fabulous History of the Britons; Giraldus, although he stayed the night at Basingwerk Abbey, a little over a mile from Holywell, and wrote his Itinerary and his Description of Wales, is silent relative to S. Winefred; although he wrote later than did Robert of Shrewsbury, yet nothing can be concluded against the cult of S. Winefred at Holywell from his silence. Curiously enough, she is not entered in the Calendar of Welsh Saints in Cotton MS. Vesp. A. xiv, of the early thirteenth century.

The MS. of Vita 1^{ma} has written against it, in Claudius A. v, "Per Elerium Britanum Monachum, An^o 660," in a seventeenth century hand, to which is further added, "aut Robertum Salopiaensem an^o 1140, ut vir quidam eruditus melius docet." The first hand is that of Thomas (or Robert) James, Librarian of Oxford, and the latter is that of Thomas Smith; but this latter made a sad blunder in supposing it to be identical with the Life by Robert of Shrewsbury.

It has been objected that there is no notice of S. Winefred in Domesday; but Domesday takes account of the manors, which are the units of composition, and not of the churches, with which its compilers had no concern. Its "Weltune" may be Holywell, which is called Treffynnon, "Well-town," by the Welsh. The English name Holywell seems to occur for the first time in a grant of 1093 (as "Haliwel"), and next in one of 1150.

¹ It has been several times printed. For a copy, collated with some half a dozen MSS., see Bye-Gones, Oswestry, 1874-5, pp. 290-1.

² Gwaith I. G., ed. Ashton, 1896, pp. 600-3.

Gwenfrewi's name does not occur in any early Welsh pedigrees of saints. She cannot have belonged to a royal family. This agrees with the account in her Life, which certainly represents her as the daughter of a man of some means, but not as wealthy and noble. Her father was Teuyth, the son of Eylud, who lived in Tegeingl (the greater part of modern Flintshire). He is described as a "valiant soldier;" but the Vita 2^{da} makes him a powerful chieftain in the country, second only to King Eliuth.¹ No such a king in Tegeingl is known from other sources; but a petty king in a province of Gwynedd may well have escaped notice by historians, and the historical records of Wales at this period are meagre in the extreme. His wife's name is only known to us through some late pedigrees. She was Gwenlo, the daughter of Bugi, the father also of Beuno.² Winefred was their only child.

Beuno came to Tegeingl and lodged with Teuyth, his brother-in-law, who asked him to train his daughter for Heaven. This her uncle consented to do, but stipulated that he should have in return a grant of lands. Teuyth was not able to give him this without the consent of the king; so he went to Eliuth, who demurred to the request, as separating the land from the common land of the tribe.³ However, he finally consented to the surrender of one villa or tref, "Abeluyc," out of the three that he possessed; and on this Beuno built a cell and chapel. This was at Sychnant, the "Dry Valley," the chapel being probably on the site of the present parish church.

One Sunday, whilst Teuyth and his wife were at Mass, Caradog, the son of Alauc (Vita 1^{ma}) or Alan (Vita 2^{da}), a youth of royal blood, was out hunting, and feeling hot and thirsty, he halted at the cottage of Teuyth, and went in to ask for something to drink. He found the beautiful Winefred alone there, and being a young man of ungovernable passions, and without scruple, attempted familiarities. Winefred ran from him through the door into the inner room, pretending that she was going to put on her Sunday gown, and, opening the back door of the house, fled down the valley to the little chapel of S. Beuno. Caradog, finding that the girl did not return, jumped on his horse and pursued her. He caught her up at the chapel door, and then in a rage cut off her head with his broad-sword. Where the head fell the rock opened and a spring bubbled up. S. Beuno rushed to the chapel door, and so roundly cursed Caradog that he melted away "like wax before the fire." Then he set on Winefred's head, and she recovered, but always retained a scar.¹ This occurrence took place on June 22. In commemoration of the miracle, when Beuno left, Winefred undertook to send him a habit (casula) of her own weaving every year in gratitude.

¹ Vita 1^{ma}, "Teuyth Eylud filius." Vita 2^{da}, "Theuith, filius unius summi atque excellentissimi senatoris et a rege secundi, Eliuth nomine." The Life of S. Beuno calls him, "Temic, son of Eliud." In Winefred's Welsh Life he is given as Tybyt and Tyuyt, and in the pedigrees mentioned in the next note, Tyvid and Tyfyd. The name occurs elsewhere—as Temit, a donor to Llancarfan, in the cartulary appended to Vita S. Cadoci, § 58; and as Tyvit and Tyvyt in the Record of Caernarvon, 1838, pp. 262, 265, 280.

² Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 119, "Gwen vrewy verch dyvid o wenlo verch Jnsi vrenin Powys J mam"; so in Llanstephan MS. 81 (eighteenth century). Jnsi = Bugi.

³ "Nequaquam mihi vel tibi sortitur tuum sequestrare rus a provincie comunione, ne sibi sit inutile vel meae necessitati." Vita 1^{ma}, c. 2.

Higden has preserved a tradition of Caradog's descendants which has been thus Englished by Trevisa²—

He þat dede þat dede, Haþ sorwe on his sede ;
His children at alle stoundes Berkeþ as whelpes of houndes.
For þy pray þat mayde grace Riȝt at þat welle place,
Oþir in Schroysbury strete ; Þere þat mayde resteþ swete.

The name of his father, Alauc, is supposed to survive in Penardd Halawg,³ now Penar-lâg, the Welsh name of Hawarden.

Beuno some little time later departed for Clynnog, from some unexplained cause. In a few years Winefred also left, and went first to Bodfari, where was a hermit, S. Deifer, who sent her on to S. Sadwrn at Henllan ; but he did not want to be troubled with her, and sent her to S. Eleri at Gwytherin, who placed her under the supervision of his mother, Theonia, and on the death of Theonia she became superior over the virgins the latter had ruled.

The Vita 1^{ma} says she went on pilgrimage to Rome, and says nothing of her journey to Gwytherin and her interviews with Deifer and Sadwrn.⁴ On her return a council of British bishops was held,

¹ Fuller, in his usual quaint manner, observes, "If the tip of his tongue who first told, and the top of his fingers who first wrote, this damnable lie, had been cut off, and had they both been sent to attend their cure at the shrine of S. Beuno, certainly they would have been more wary afterwards how they reported or recorded such improbable untruths." Worthies, ed. 1840, iii, p. 538. Beuno is credited with having raised six persons in all from the dead.

² Polychronicon, ed. Babington, 1865, i, p. 428. Cf. Peniarth MS. 163, "Ef a vydd plant oi lin Ef yn kyvarth val kwn hyd pann ddelwynt yno [Holywell] i offrwm nev i mwythic."

³ "Pennar-dd Alawc" is given as a variant reading in Brut y Tywysogion, Rolls ed., p. 372, from the Book of Basingwerk (Gutyn Owain). The name seems to mean "Alog's Hill."

⁴ "Eo tempore, ut memorant, Romam petiit, visitandi causa sanctorum apostolorum loca, ut ibi in præsentia reliquiarum sanctorum, se totam Deo devote offeret," c. 9.

which she attended, where a canon was passed requiring those saints who lived dispersed to congregate in monasteries.¹

According to the Vita 2^{da} she founded a convent of virgins at Beuno's church in Holywell, and remained there after his departure for seven years, until his death.

She was constituted superior over eleven virgins at Gwytherin, and there she died, and was buried by S. Eleri,² having survived her decollation fifteen years. Her relics were translated with great pomp to the Abbey at Shrewsbury in 1138.³ At the Dissolution her shrine was rifled of its contents, and only one portion of her relics, a finger, it is alleged, escaped destruction.

We come now to a consideration of some of the difficulties that occur in the story, and make it impossible to accept it, without considerable deductions. The initial difficulty is with her name, in Welsh Gwenfrewi, which is suspiciously descriptive of the Holy Well. Some writers have regarded it as being equivalent to Gwenffrwd, a somewhat common brook-name in South Wales, meaning "a Fair or Clear Brook;" but this cannot be admitted. Her name is Gwenfrewi, and is matched by the Coll ab Coll-frewi of the Triads. It was not her original name. To quote her Welsh Life in Llanstephan MS. 34, "The people of that country say that her name at first was Brewy, and that it was on account of the white thread round her neck that she became called Gwenn Vrewy;"⁴ that is, from her decollation. But it should be remembered that Gwyn or Gwen was not an uncommon prefix and affix in the case of Welsh saints' names. There is no notice of the change of name in the Vita 1^{ma}, but we are told that she was generally known as "Candida Wenefreda."

It is popularly assumed that Winefred is the English form of the Welsh Gwenfrewi; but it would be quite impossible to philologically

¹ "In diebus illis, totius Britanniae sancti ad synodum Wenefredi concionabantur. Ad quam cum aliis sanctis etiam beata Wenefreda ascendit. Ibidemque omnibus ritu synodali religiose institutis, videlicet, ut sancti qui antea disparati singillatim vivebant, nullam habentes regulam nisi voluntatem; postea gregatim convenirent in locis ad hoc congruis, et eorum conversationem sub prioribus proventis sibi praefectis emendarent." Ibid.

² Vita 1^{ma} states that she was buried on June 24, and Vita 2^{da} that she died on November 2. Edward Lhuyd, in his Itinerary, 1699, gives a sketch of her tombstone in Capel Gwenfrewi at Gwytherin, and also of her arch or shrine in the church.

³ A portion of her shrine is still in the abbey, by one of the north-west pillars. Her great bell there was famous for its fine tone. It weighed 35 cwts., and required four men to ring it. It was broken in 1730, and sold.

⁴ Cf. of the well, "Fons martyris trium dierum spatio lacteo liquore emanare visus est," Vita 2^{da}, c. 26. The name of one of the three villae owned by Teuyth was Gwenffynnon, "the White or Fair Well." This may have been the original name of the well.

square the names. As a matter of fact, there is no relationship whatever between them. Gwenfrewi has been simply guessed into the purely English name Winefred, earlier Winefridu, compounded of wine, "a friend," and fridu, "peace."¹

The story of the head being cut off is a commonplace in Celtic hagiography. S. Sidwell and her sister, S. Jutwara, whom we equate with the Breton S. Aude, had their heads cut off; so had S. Noyala or Newlyna; so had a daughter of Ynyr Gwent, S. Tegiwg, whose head also S. Beuno put on; so had the carpenter who married Tegiwg, with the same results; and there are many more instances.

What really happened was probably no more than this, that Winefred ran away from Caradog, he overtook her, and in the struggle she was wounded by him in the throat, but was easily cured by her mother and Beuno.

As to the fountain springing up on the spot, that also is a commonplace in Celtic legend. The damsel whose head was cut off in the hazel brake by the wife of Boia, in the Life of S. David, gave occasion to a miraculous spring rising where her head fell. It was the same with S. Jutwara, and with S. Tegiwg and S. Noyala.

The spring of Holywell is remarkable for the volume of water that gushes forth, and doubtless was in veneration in pre-Christian times. That Beuno had his chapel near it is probable enough, and also probably employed it as a baptistery. He may have regenerated Winefred in it.

The red ferruginous veins in the stones of the well, and the crimson Muscus subrubeus or (Lin.) Byssus iolithus found growing on them in the water, was easily supposed to be the blood of the martyr miraculously reproduced in testimony to the truth of the story.²

¹ See Prof. Skeat, "The Corrupt Spelling of Old English Names," in The Cambridge Antiquarian Society's Communications, vol. xiii (1908).

² It is said in Vita 1^{ma} of the well, "Cujus lapides usque in hodiernum diem, utpote in die prima, sanguinolenti videntur; massa etiam ut thus odorat." In Vita 2^{da}, "Et quoniam de corpore in decensu dexeri montis jacente multus effusus sanguis, lapides aspergine ipsius infecti tam in fontis scaturigine quam in rivo illius seu in amborum margine passim jacebant; et, quod dictu vel auditu mirabile est, lapides illi conspersi sanguine adhuc pristinam conspersionem retinent. Nam sunt quasi coagulato cruore perfusi . . . muscicula vero, quæ eisdem lapidibus adhæret, quasi thus redolet."

The violet-scented moss clinging to the side of the well is Jungermannia asplenioides, and is found in many other wells, as are also pebbles streaked with red. The moss is popularly known as S. Winefred's Hair. In Peniarth MS. 118, p. 693, it is called "Gweryd Gwenbhrewy." Drayton in his Polyolbion, 2nd part, 1622, p. 59, refers to it:—

"her mosse most sweet and rare, Against infectious dampes for Pomander to weare."

The following occurs in Cardiff MS. 50, of the sixteenth century:—
 “The Mosse y^t groweth vpon Stones w^hin yt ys very sweete of odour and smell, whereof there bee Garlandes made and caryed many myles for y^e rarenes of the matter. Yt ys sayde that Stones, Wands or handkercherffs cast into yt do gather as yt were redd spotted of the Colour of blood.”

Count de Montalembert says: “At the spot where the head of this martyr of modesty struck the soil, there sprung up an abundant fountain, which is still frequented, and even venerated, by a population divided into twenty different sects, but animated by one common hatred for Catholic truth. This fountain has given its name to the town of Holywell. Its source is covered by a fine Gothic porch of three arches, under which it forms a vast basin, where, from morning to evening, the sick and infirm of a region ravaged by heresy, come to bathe, with a strange confidence in the miraculous virtue of these icy waters.”

The source had, of course, flowed for thousands of years before Winefred existed.

From Holywell Winefred migrated to Gwytherin, where she had a monastery, and died. With regard to Deifer, Sadwrn, and Eleri we have dealt with them elsewhere, under their respective names.

Of the conclave of prelates passing the canon for collecting the hermits into communities we know nothing. There was indeed a Council held at York in 660, in which S. Cedd was consecrated by two British bishops, but it is most unlikely that this conclave can have been attended by S. Winefred.

We come now to the chronology of her Life.

We are told that she was a young girl when Cadfan was king.¹ Cadfan, whose tombstone is at Llangadwaladr, in Anglesey, is generally held to have died about 630, and this is about the date of Beuno's departure to Clynnog, which was in the reign of Cadwallon, his son.²

The Vita 2^{da} says that Winefred remained seven years at Holywell after the departure of Beuno, i.e. to 637, when she went to Gwytherin. She did not live to an advanced age, for S. Eleri outlived her and buried her, and we may put her death as occurring about 650-60.

On the whole, we are not justified in rejecting the broad outline of the story of S. Winefred because of the fabulous and adventitious matter that has grown about it, and we are disposed to regard her relations with Deifer, Sadwrn and Eleri, and her residence at Gwytherin, as the most certain points in her story. That as a young girl she was solicited by a certain young cub of a noble, that she resisted him, and that she was scratched in the scuffle with him is all that can be admitted; out of that a huge overgrowth of fable has arisen.

¹ Vita 1^{ma}, c. 1, “In diebus agitur quibus Catuanus super Venedociæ provincis regnabat,” etc.

² “A gwedy marw Katuan yd aeth Beuno y ymwelet a Chadwallawn vab Catuan oed vrenhin gwedy Catuan.” Buchedd Beuno in Llyvyr Agkyr, p. 123.

Archbishop Arundel, in 1398, and Archbishop Chicheley, in 1415,¹ ordered the celebration of her festival, with nine lessons from her legend, and it was then introduced into the Sarum Breviary. Before that her name occurs in no calendars; afterwards it was introduced frequently.

She has two commemorations—June 22, that of her decollation or martyrdom, and November 3, that of her second death and, afterwards, her translation. The latter is her principal festival. The two days occur in a good many Welsh calendars from the fifteenth century. A few calendars give Gwenfrewi against September 19 and 20.

It is somewhat remarkable that there are, or have been, but very few churches in Wales dedicated to S. Winefred. The parish church of Holywell was originally dedicated to her (with festival on November 3), but apparently from the eighteenth century it has been dedicated to S. James the Apostle. The chapel over the Well is still dedicated to her. At Gwytherin, within a few yards of the church, on the south side, and within the churchyard, stood Capel Gwenfrewi, until, as stated in its Terrier of 1749, it was "some years agoe demolish'd by one Edwards lately Rector of the Parish." The modern parish church of Penrhiwceiber, and a church in the parish of S. Fagan (Aberdare), both in Glamorgan, are dedicated to her. She is not, however, the patron of Vaynor, in Breconshire, as sometimes given. There is a S. Winefred's Well at Woolston, in the parish of West Felton, Salop—a cruciform bath, with a cottage, evidently a chapel formerly, above it, as at Holywell. The spot is supposed to have been one of the resting places for her relics on their way to Shrewsbury.

In Devon there are Manaton and Branscombe, the latter having changed its patron, probably after 1415, from S. Branwalader to S. Winefred. Kingston-on-Soar and Screveten, in Nottingham, and Stainton, in Yorkshire, have her as patron, unless it is a mistake for ¹ Wilkins, Concilia, iii, pp. 234, 376. The collects, in Welsh, for the two commemorations may be found in Allwydd Paradwys, Liege, 1670, pp. 361, 373. "Caniad Gwenfrewi" is given as the name of an old Welsh air. Myv. Arch. p. 1,075.

S. Wilfrid. The modern church of Bickley, in Cheshire, is dedicated to her. The parish of Holywell, in the city of Oxford, is so named from the Well of SS. Winefred and Margaret, near the church.

In the legend, S. Winefred is said to have sent annually the habit she had woven for S. Beuno on a stone in the well,¹ where "the parcel was not wetted by the water, and the stream carried it, dry and uninjured, down into the broad estuary of the River Dee. All that day and the following night it was borne forward by the waves, and in the morning was cast on the shore close to the spot where Beuno had fixed his habitation. In the morning, when Beuno came out of the church, he stood for some time on the shore, admiring the expanse of waters and watching the ebb of the tide, when his eye was caught by the folded cloth left on the shore by the retreating waves. He went forward and raised it, unfolded the cloth wrapped round it, and found the cloak unharmed by the waves; even the outer cloth was perfectly dry."² And that after a voyage of some sixty miles or more!

The Well of S. Winefred, issuing from the upper beds of the chert, is a really singular phenomenon on account of the enormous quantity of water it yields. It is the most copious natural spring in Britain, and is justly regarded as one of the Seven Wonders of Wales. The stream formed by the fountain, formerly called by the Welsh Afon Wenfrewi, runs with a rapid course to the sea, which it reaches in a little over a mile. Dr. Johnson, who passed through Holywell in 1774, notes in his Diary that it then turned no fewer than nineteen mills. An analysis of the water shows that "there is nothing remarkable in its composition, as regards either the quantity or the quality of the substances dissolved in it, excepting perhaps its freedom from organic matter."³ "Its peculiarities are that it never freezes, although intensely cold, and scarcely ever varies in the supply of water, the only difference after wet weather being a considerable

¹ Vita 2da, "Kalendis Maii, venit beata virgo cum pluribus aliis ad fontem in quo praecepto viri dei munus suum depositura erat; acceptamque casulam albo prius mantili involvit; sicque in medio fontis eam deposuit; se dicens fontis ministerio hanc beato viro Beunoo dirigere. Et ecce, mirabile dictu, . . . panniculus ille quo casula involvebatur nullam lesionem ab aqua patiebatur nec vel minimam aquæ infusionem sentiebat, etc." With the story compare that of Brigid, the daughter of Cú Cathrach, sending a chasuble to S. Senan, which she sent to Inis Cathaig in a basket, placing it on the Shannon. Lives of Saints from the Book of Lismore, ed. Dr. Wh. Stokes, 1890, pp. 218-9. The large stone now in the bath, near the steps, is known as S. Beuno's Stone, and regarded as a wishing stone.

² The Life of Saint Winefride, edited by Thomas Swift, S.J., Holywell, S. Winefride's Presbytery, 1900, p. 36.

³ Barrat in Quart. Journ. Chem. Soc., xii (1860), p. 52.

S. GWENFREWI.

From 15th century Glass in Llandyrnog Church.

discoloration of a wheyey tinge. It rushed out of the rock with such rapidity, that the basin, which could contain 200 tuns of water, was, when emptied, refilled in two minutes, proving that there was a continual supply at the rate of 100 tuns a minute. The supply is now reduced to about 21 tuns a minute. The chapel over the well is an exquisite specimen of late Perpendicular work, and was erected by Margaret, Countess of Richmond, and mother of Henry VII. The groined arches which rise from the polygonal sides of the well are particularly rich and graceful, and are adorned with figures and escutcheons of the Stanley family, Catherine of Aragon, and others. The five angular recesses are, no doubt, intended to represent the five porches of the pool of Bethesda." ¹

At the well, under a niche, is a pretty statue of S. Winefred, with palm branch in one hand and crozier in the other; but she is incorrectly represented as wearing a crown, as though of royal race. There is a figure of her, as well as of S. Beuno, in one of the panels of the fourteenth-century refectory pulpit of Shrewsbury Abbey. She is also represented in fifteenth-century glass in the chancel window of Llandyrnog Church, in the Vale of Clwyd; and was formerly in Clynnog Church.

As the Bollandist De Smedt, S.J., very judiciously observes: "Is the history of S. Winefred to be admitted as certain and proved, such as we have it in the two Lives? That I would not dare to affirm, for we receive the story only from traditions of uncertain origin, perhaps only committed to writing in the twelfth century, some five hundred years after the period at which S. Winefred lived, as we judge from the authority of these same traditions. And this authority, forsooth, is not sufficient to enable us to believe firmly in the stupendous miracles attributed to this holy virgin." ² The opinion of De Smedt is sure to be shared by all men of intelligence, their minds unclouded by prejudice. No amount of frothy verbiage can obscure the fact that five hundred years elapsed between the supposed decollation of S. Winefred, and the story being committed to writing—plenty of time for the growth of fable. That the crimson moss was believed to be the saint's blood held its own till recently, and is only reluctantly abandoned because scientific evidence is too strong to be overcome.

¹ Murray's Handbook of North Wales, 1885, pp. 40-1. See also Mrs. Thrale's observations on the well in her Journal (1774), recently published for the first time; Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Thrale, by Broadley and Secombe, London, 1909, pp. 187-8. The Well is now held on a lease by the Jesuit Fathers of the Holywell Mission from the Holywell Urban Council.

² Acta SS. Boll., Nov. 1, p. 694. See also "The Bollandists on S. Winefride" in the Month for 1893, pp. 421-37, by Herbert Lucas, S.J.

The Apostle cautioned his converts against giving heed to "cunningly devised fables;" this is not even cunningly devised.

Haddan and Stubbs go too far when they class her among saints "who almost certainly never existed at all."¹ The documentary evidence as to her existence, it is true, is not of the best kind. At most, in early times she was a purely local saint. By the twelfth century, some 500 years after her death, she had at Holywell and at Gwytherin a notable cult and a definite story. The celebrity of the Well named after her, and her translation, may be regarded as having been mainly responsible for her eminence as a saint.

S. GWENFREWI, Daughter of Brychan

A GWENFREWI is entered in some of the later lists of Brychan's children as a daughter of his,² but she is entirely unknown to the Cognatio and other early authorities. No particulars are given of her except in Peniarth MS. 131 (fifteenth-sixteenth century), where it is stated that she was "the wife of Cadrod Calchfynydd, whom Tynwedd Faglog violated at Rhydau Tynwedd." This, however, is a mistake, for the Cognatio gives Brychan's daughter Gwrygon Goddeu as wife of Cadrod.

The churches of Talgarth and Vaynor, in Breconshire, have been supposed, but wrongly, to be dedicated to this Gwenfrewi.³

S. GWENFRON

CAPEL GWENFRON is given by George Owen in his *Pembrokeshire*⁴ as one of the ruined pilgrimage chapels in the parish of Nevern, Pembrokeshire, that were formerly used for solemn processions on Holy Days. Gwenfron is a female name, but it is not borne by anyone included among the Welsh saints.

In the Third (or latest) Series of the Welsh Triads a Gwenfron, daughter of Tudwal Tudclud, is distinguished as being one of the three "Chaste Women of the Isle of Britain,"⁵ but in the same Triad in the so-called First Series her name is given as Gwenfadon.⁶

¹ Councils, etc., i, p. 161. Sir J. Rhys in Revue Celtique, ii (1875), p. 336, is disposed to regard her as "a water-nymph or dawn-goddess."

² Peniarth MS. 131, p. 111; Cambro-British Saints, p. 271; Iolo MSS., p. 140.

³ Jones, Breconshire, ed. 1898, pp. 331, 473.

⁴ i, p. 509. With its elements transposed the name occurs as Bronwen.

⁵ Myv. Arch., p. 410.

⁶ Ibid., p. 392.

S. GWENFYL

GWENFYL, or Gwenful, is reputed to have been a daughter of Brychan, and her name occurs, with Gwynan, Gwynws, and Callwen, as children of his, not included in the ordinary lists, that occur in a Demetian calendar, of which the earliest copy is in Cwrtmawr MS. 44, of the sixteenth century.¹ Gwenfyl and her sister Callwen are commemorated therein on November 1. In the calendar in Additional MS. 12,913, written in 1508, occurs "Urvul a Gwenvul" on July 6. Her chapel, Capel Gwenfyl, stood in the village of Llangeitho, Cardiganshire, but was allowed to fall down in the seventeenth century. Marriages are known to have been celebrated in it, and it had a cemetery.² There is a Ffynnon Wenwyl or Wenfyl on a farm of the name, near the Alun, less than a mile from the church of Llanarmon-yn-Iâl, Denbighshire.

Browne Willis³ and Meyrick⁴ give Capel Gwynfyl or Gwynfil, subject to Llanddewi Brefi, as dedicated to S. Gwynfyl, with festival on November 2. It was situated in the township of Gwynfyl, and separated from the village of Llangeitho proper by the river Aeron. The same saint and chapel are intended.

S. GWENLLIW, Virgin

SOME late accounts give Gwenlliw, with her sisters Mwynen and Gwenan, as daughters of Brynach Wyddel by Corth or Cymorth, daughter of Brychan; ⁵ but they are also said to have been daughters of Brychan.⁶ All that may perhaps be safely said of them is that they were of Brychan's saintly tribe. The authorities for their existence are quite late.

Nothing is known of Gwenlliw.

A Gwenllian is given in Peniarth MS. 178 as a daughter of Brychan, but the name is a mistake for Lluan.

S. GWENLLWYFO, Virgin

GWENLLWYFO, or Gwenllwyddog, is simply entered, without pedigree, in the Myvyrian Archaiology ⁷ as the patroness of Llanwenllwyfo,

¹ Denominated S.

² Cymru, 1903, p. 56. See further under SS. ERFYL and GWENFAEL.

³ Parochiale Anglic., 1733, p. 195.

⁴ Cardiganshire, 1808, p. 47.

⁵ Iolo MSS., pp. 121, 141. With the name cf. Gwynlliw or Gwynllyw.

⁶ Myv. Arch., p. 428; cf. p. 417.

⁷ P. 426.

in Anglesey. Her festival, according to Angharad Llwyd,¹ is November 30; but beyond this nothing seems to be known of her.

S. GWENNOLE, see S. WINWALOE

S. GWENOG, Virgin

THE pedigree of Gwenog is nowhere given.² She is the patroness of Llanwenog, in Cardiganshire, the two divisions of which parish are called Blaenau Gwenog and Bro Gwenog. The festival of Gwenog Wryf is January 3, and occurs in the calendar in Cwrtmawr MS. 44 (sixteenth century), and in that in Additional MS. 14,886 (written 1643-4), as well as in Browne Willis and a number of Welsh Almanacks of the eighteenth century. On her festival is "a fair at which formerly offerings were made." The fair, called Ffair Wenog, is now on January 14. Her holy well, Ffynnon Wenog, is in a field near the church, and gives an abundant flow of crystal water, which was believed to be efficacious in the case of young children with weak backs. They were to be bathed or immersed in the well early in the morning before sunrise.

The fifteenth century Llanstephan MS. 116, a copy of the Laws of Hywel Dda, contains several invocations to S. Gwenog, from which it is inferred that the MS. was written in the parish of Llanwenog, or by a native of it. It furnishes an interesting specimen of the dialectal peculiarities of South Cardiganshire.³

"Haved Wennok" (Hafod Wenog), somewhere in the neighbourhood of Neath, occurs in insperimus charters (1289, 1336) of Neath Abbey.⁴

S. GWENONWY, Matron

GWENONWY was the daughter of Meurig ab Tewdrig, King of Morgannwg. Though nowhere expressly mentioned as a Welsh saint, she

¹ Hist. Anglesey, 1833, p. 282.

² Gwenog was also a man's name. It occurs as that of a clerical witness in the Book of Llan Dâv, p. 186; cf. also the Black Book of S. David's (1326), ed. Willis Bund, 1902, pp. 187-9. The name is to be distinguished from Gwynog.

³ J. Gwenogvryn Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., ii, pp. 567-8. See also Aneurin Owen's ed. of Welsh Laws, 1841, p. 579, and Myv. Arch., p. 946, where at the end of a legal Triad we have "Gwenoc helpa!" (Gwenog help us!).

⁴ G. T. Clark, Cartæ, ii, p. 195; iv, p. 159.

might well be included among the number. She was the wife of S. Gwyndaf Hên, by whom she became the mother of S. Meugant and S. Henwyn. She was sister to Athrwys, King of Gwent, Comereg, Bishop of Llandaff, Ffriog and Idnerth, as well as of Anna and Afrella.

In the *Book of Llan Dâu*¹ are two documents recording the grant of the villa of Guennonoe or Guinnonui to the church of Llandaff, in the time of Bishop Berthwyn. It was situated "juxta paludem Mourici," and is supposed to be in Mathern, Monmouthshire, near Pwll Meurig. "The ruins of the chapel exist in a brake between Pwll Meurig Village and Moun-ton."²

S. GWENRHIW, Virgin

GWENRHIW was one of the daughters of Brychan Brycheiniog.³ She is entered as Gwenrhiw Forwyn, or Virgin, against November 11 in the Calendars in Peniarth MSS. 187 and 219, and the Prymer of 1618. No churches are known to be dedicated to her.⁴

Gwenrhiw (also Gwenthrew) is the name of a township of Kerry, in Montgomeryshire.

S. GWERYDD, Confessor

GWERYDD, as saint, is known to us only through the Iolo MSS.,⁴ and his existence is very doubtful. He is said to have been a son of Cadwn ab Cynan (or Cenau) ab Eudaf, descended from the mythical Brân Fendigaid. His church is said to be Llanwerydd, afterwards called Llanddunwyd, San Dunwyd, and S. Donats, in Glamorgan-shire.⁵

He is also credited with having had a chapel formerly dedicated to him at Emral, near Bangor Iscoed.⁶ Caer Werydd is usually given as the Welsh name of Lancaster.

¹ Pp. 179, 191.

² Wakeman, Supplementary Notes to Liber Landavensis, 1853, p. 12.

³ Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 120; Cambro-British Saints, p. 271.

⁴ Pp. 100, 135, 370; cf. Taliesin Williams, Doom of Colyn Dolphyn, London, 1837, p. 154. Guerith is the father of a lay witness in the Book of Llan Dâu, p. 150.

⁵ ii, p. 386.

⁶ Bye-Gones, Oswestry, 1882-3, p. 164.

Yes. (Bottle given by ... 1821) p. 153. ... 48

S. GWESTLAN, Bishop, Confessor

IN the Llyfr Ancr Welsh Life of S. David, this saint's name is spelt Gwestlan, Gweslan and Goeslan, and is latinized as, among other forms, Guistilianus and Gistlianus. He was maternal uncle to S. David, being the son of Cynyr of Caer Gawch, and brother of SS. Non and Gwen. He was a bishop in the district of Menevia, but no churches are known as bearing his name. He resided at the Old Bush, which is probably where was later Ty Gwyn on the slope of Carn Llidi.

David must have owed his education in part to him. David said to his uncle, "From the place where you propose to serve, scarcely one in a hundred will go to the kingdom of God." This he said an angel had told him, and he added that the angel had shown him "a place from which but few would go to hell; for every one who should be buried in the cemetery in sound faith would obtain mercy."¹ This is Rhygyfarch's story. As has been said, under S. DAVID, there were practical reasons for moving the site of the monastery. Gwestlan would seem to have acted as bishop in this monastery under Mancen, who was superior.

From the Welsh Life of S. David we learn that one summer there was a great drought at S. David's. Gwestlan and Eliud (Teilo) prayed to God, and obtained two fountains possessing healing properties, which were called after them Ffynnon Gwestlan and Ffynnon Eliud.²

His Festival occurs as March 2 in the calendar in Cotton MS. Vespasian A. xiv, but as the 4th in that in Additional MS. 22, 720.

S. GWETHENOC Abbot, Confessor

GWETHENOC and James were twin brothers, sons of Fracan and Gwen Teirbron, and born in Britain, probably in Cornwall (see S. FRACAN).

The Life of the brothers is contained in a MS. in the National Library at Paris (MS. Lat. 5296, f. 62); it has been extracted in part by De Smedt, and these portions printed in Catalogus Codicum hagiographicarum Latin., 1887, T. i, pp. 578-82. They are also spoken of in the Life of S. Winwaloe, their brother, who was born after Fracan and Gwen had come to Armorica.

¹ Cambro-British Saints, p. 124; cf. Giraldu*s, Opera*, iii, p. 386.

² Llyfr Ancr Llanddewi Brefi, ed. Profs. J. Morris Jones and Rhys, 1894, p. 110.

On reaching the north coast of Brittany, after Fracan and his wife had formed their settlement, they committed their three boys to S. Budoc, who was living an eremitical life in the island of Bréhat, but kept there a school for young Britons.

One day, as the twins left their class, and all the other lads indulged in romps, they lighted on a blind beggar. Thereupon one anointed his eyes with spittle, and the other made the sign of the cross over them. Then, the legend says, he recovered his sight—probably the attempt failed, but the writer of the biography could not admit this. The man made such an outcry, that a rabble of boys collected round him and drew him and the twins before Budoc, who inquired into the matter.

Another day, when he was alone, James encountered a leper, who extended his diseased hand for alms. James in an access of compassion, stooped and kissed the loathsome palm.

After having spent several years under Budoc, the brothers went to the peninsula of Landouart, and founded there a little community, of which Gwethenoc undertook the direction.

On a certain day, when they were harvesting, a harmless grass-snake bit one of the brothers, in whose sheaf it lurked. He was in deadly alarm, not being aware that such snakes are innocuous, and it was thought miraculous that he was none the worse for the adventure.

At last the monastery became so crowded that the twins yearned for a more quiet life, and they retired—the Life says together, but according to the Life of S. Winwaloe, it was Gwethenoc alone who departed, and confided the charge of the monastery to James.

There was an islet at no great distance from the settlement that could be reached by boat. However, an unusually low tide happening to occur, the brothers walked on the sand and waded till they reached it, and found there a fresh-water spring.

Here they established another monastery, which also in time became populous, and the brothers ruled it together as fellow abbots.

They became so famous that, even whilst they were alive, sailors when in danger invoked their aid. When they did so, suddenly the heavenly twins appeared in light upon the vessel, one at the head, the other at the stern, and went about handling various parts of the ship, "quasi curiosi," and conducted the vessel safely into port. They had obviously usurped the position of Castor and Pollux.

The monastery founded by the brothers was afterwards known as S. Jacut-de-la-Mer, on a peninsula, near Ploubalay in Côtes du Nord. It never was an island, but a peninsula.

It is said that the brothers one night dreamt that they saw S. Patrick, who informed them that in heaven they would occupy thrones on a level with his own.

There is a chapel, half buried in sand, now called S. Enodoc, on the Padstow Harbour, that appears in Bishop Lacey's Register, September 16, 1434, as Capella Sti. Gwinedoci, and which is described as "the chapel of Guenedouci" in an inventory of the goods of the chapel made in 1607-13.

William of Worcester gives a commemoration of S. Wethenoc from the Bodmin Calendar on November 7, but although he possibly means the same saint as Gwinedoc of the Register of Bishop Lacey we cannot say for certain that he does.

At S. Enodoc the Feast was formerly held on July 24, but in 1434 Bishop Lacey transferred it to July 13.

The Welsh dd and Cornish th in Breton becomes z, and Gwethenoc has been altered into Goueznou, the final c falling away. By this he has been confounded with another saint, also called Goueznou, and who originally, doubtless, was a Gwethenoc, and was the son of Tugdo and Tugdonia, and is commemorated on October 25, and whose Life we shall give presently (under S. GWYDDNO).

There is a chapel of S. Goueznou at Pléguien near S. Briec, and as this is the plebs of his mother Gwen, who has her statue in the church, unquestionably the chapel belongs to her son Gwethenoc, and not to the Goueznou son of Tugdo.

Garaby gives November 5 as the day of S. Gwethenoc; as we have seen, the Bodmin Calendar gave November 7. July 6 was observed as the feast of the translation of the relics of SS. James and Gwethenoc—MS. Missal of S. Malo, fifteenth-century MS. Breviary of S. Melanias, Rennes, and the S. Malo Breviary of 1537.

S. GWLADYS, Matron

GWLADYS was one of the many daughters of Brychan, and the wife of Gwynllyw Filwr, King of Gwynllywg, by whom she became the mother of Cadoc and others.¹ John of Tynemouth, in his Life of S. Keyna, mentions her as Brychan's "primogenita filia."

There are two very different accounts as to how Gwynllyw obtained Gwladys for his wife. That in his Life¹ is commonplace enough. Having "heard of the gentleness and beauty" of Gwladys, he sent ambassadors to Brychan asking him that she might become his wife, and he was accepted as an eligible suitor without ado.

¹ Cognatio de Brychan; Jesus Coll. MS. 20; Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 426; Iolo MSS. pp. 111, 120, 140.

In the other account, given in the prologue to the Life of her son, S. Cadoc,² Gwynllyw is said to have carried her off by force. She was of "very high reputation, elegant in appearance, beautiful in form, and adorned with silk vestments." He sent messengers to Brychan "earnestly requesting that she should be given to him in marriage; but Brychan was angry, and, full of rage, refused to betroth his daughter, and slighted the messengers." Gwynllyw thereupon "armed as many as three hundred slaves, who should take the young lady away by force." They came to Brychan's court at Talgarth, "and found the young lady before the door of her residence, sitting with her sisters, and passing the time in modest conversation; whom they immediately took by force, and returned with speed."

Brychan followed in hot pursuit, "whom when Gwynllyw saw, he frequently ordered the said young lady to be brought forward, and he made her ride with him; and not flying, but taking her slowly on horseback, he preceded his army, waited for his soldiers, and manfully exhorted them to battle." He arrived safely with her at the hill Boch riu carn (now Vochriw), which formed the boundary between Brycheiniog and Gwynllywg. Sitting on top of the hill happened to be King Arthur with his two knights, Cai and Bedwyr, playing dice, and they observed what was taking place. "Arthur was immediately seized with love towards the lady," but his companions dissuaded him from taking her away from her captor, and, on learning that Gwynllyw was within his own territory, they "rushed upon his enemies, who, turning their backs, fled with great confusion to their own country." Thus, with the assistance of Arthur, Gwynllyw brought his prize triumphantly "to his palace that was on that hill," which was afterwards called Allt Wynllyw.

"King Gwynllyw united himself in lawful wedlock" to Gwladys, and "four lamps were seen shining every night, with great brightness, in the four corners of the house where she remained, until she brought forth her first-born son," Cadoc.

The same Life, further on,³ does not speak favourably of Gwynllyw and Gwladys. Gwynllyw, now advancing in years, still clung to his free-booting habits, and otherwise "disgraced his life with crimes." Cadoc was grieved at hearing this, and sent three of his faithful disciples to try to prevail upon him to mend his ways. Gwladys reasoned with her husband, "Let us trust to our son, and he will be a father to us in heaven." He gave way, and they both "confessed their crimes with the satisfaction of penance." They now devoted themselves to religion, and in expiation of their sins, "Gwladys built for herself a church in Pencarnou; Gwynllyw also soon erected another monastery." Pencarnou is probably to be identified with Pencarn, in the parish of Bassaleg, Monmouthshire. On a cliff overlooking the River Ebbw is an old building which has been converted into two cottages, called Rock Cottages. This is supposed to have been her church. The old people of the neighbourhood used to say that they had always heard that there had been a church there, with a graveyard attached. A large mound behind the cottages is thought to be her grave.¹ Her spring is in Tredegar Park.

¹ Cambro-British Saints, p. 146.

² Ibid., pp. 23-4.

³ Pp. 84-6.

The church that Gwynllyw erected was Eglwys Wynllyw, now known as S. Woolos, in Newport, close to which he had his dwelling, and near it, on "the bank of the Ebod" or Ebbw, as stated in the Life of S. Gwynllyw,² Gwladys had her abode. Here "they both lived religiously and abstemiously," and bore their penance, "enjoying the fruits of their own labour."³

The situation of another church dedicated to S. Gwladys is well known, viz. Eglwys Wladys, or Capel Gwladys, on Gelligaer Mountain, about two miles to the north of Gelligaer Church. It has been in ruins for many centuries, but its foundations, consisting of west tower, nave and chancel, within an enclosure, are still visible. It was privately occupied "as a house" in 1584.⁴ The parish attached to it now forms part of the parish of Gelligaer, the parish church of which is dedicated to S. Cadoc.

To her is dedicated also the modern parish church of Bargoed, formed out of Gelligaer in 1904. Forest Gwladys is on Gelligaer Mountain, Llwyn Gwladys in Llangynwyd, and Bryn Gwladys in Pentyrch. Edward Lhuyd gives Croes Wladys among the crosses of Bangor Iscoed, but this cannot have been named after Brychan's daughter.

¹ Mrs. Harcourt Mitchell, Some Ancient Churches of Gwent, 1908, p. 28.

² Cambro-British Saints, p. 148. ³ See further under S. GWYNLLYW.

⁴ Cardiff Records, i (1898), p. 398. For the grant to Margam Abbey by William, Earl of Gloucester, 1147-83, of "all the land of S. Gladus, with its pastures as far as the Bohru carn," etc., see Birch, Hist. of Margam Abbey, London, 1897, p. 16.

S. GWNWS, see S. GWYNWS

S. GWODLOYW, see S. GWYDDLOYW

S. GWRDAF, Confessor

GWRDAF, reducible to Gwrda, is a Welsh personal name, occurring only rarely, but quite distinct from the common noun gwrda, meaning an optimus or nobleman. The name does not occur in any pedigrees of the Welsh Saints,¹ but the church of Llanwrda, Carmarthenshire, is under the invocation of S. Gwrdaf. Sometimes Cawrdaf ab Caradog Freichfras is given as its patron, but this is impossible, on philological grounds.² In the Talley Abbey charter of 1331 the church is called "Lanurdam."³ Rees took the name as simply bearing the more obvious meaning of "the Church of the Holy Man"—not embodying the name of any particular saint—and adds that the Wake ap Llanwrda depended upon November 12, i.e. All Saints' Day, O.S.⁴

By the Gwrda on December 5 in the calendar prefixed to Allwydd Paradwys, 1670, is meant S. Cawrdaf, whose festival falls on that day.

Of Gwrdaf nothing is known.

S. GWRDDELW, Confessor

In the various lists of Caw's children given in the Iolo MSS. occur the following names, Gwrddelw (in four lists), Gwrddwdw (one list), Gwrddyly (two lists), and Gwrthili (one list).⁵ There can hardly be a doubt that the four forms represent but one name. None of

¹ As might be expected, the Iolo MSS. (p. 144) duly enter Gwrda as patron of Llanwrda. Castell "Kelli Wrda" in Brut y Tywysogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 378, is a curious corruption of "Kenilworth" Castle. In his list of wells in the parish of Cwm, near S. Asaph, Edward Llwyd enters "Ffynnon Wrda corruptè pro DhGrda." Browne Willis, Pavochiale Anglicanum, 1733, p. 176, gives an imaginary Cwrda as patron of Jordanston, Pembrokeshire. The Welsh name of the parish is Tre Iwrdan (Peniarth MS. 147, c. 1566; the Jordanus of Geoffrey's Hist. Reg. Brit., viii, c. 19, appears as Jwrdan in the Welsh text), one name being a translation of the other.

² Jones, Breconshire, ed. 1898, p. 37, thought the parish-name might be a corruption of Llangawrdaf!

³ Daniel-Tyssen and Evans, Carmarthen Charters, 1878, p. 63. The termination -dam (later -daf) = -tamos, occurs also in Cyndaf, Gwyndaf, Maeldaf, etc. On the chalice (1673) the parish-name is spelt "Lanworda."

⁴ Welsh Saints, p. 270.

⁵ Pp. 109, 117, 137, 142-3.

them can be identified with any of Caw's sons mentioned in the tale of Culhwch and Olwen. Gwrddelw appears in Brittany as Gourdelw or Gurdelw.¹

In the *Myvyrian Archaiology*² Gwrtheli or Gartheli is entered as patron of Capel Gartheli (or simply Gartheli), formerly a chapelry within the parish of Llanddewi Brefi, Cardiganshire, but now, with Bettws Leiki, a separate benefice. The *Iolo MSS.*³ state that Gwrddily had a church in Caerleon on Usk.

January 7 occurs in the Calendar in Peniarth MS. 219 (circa 1615) as the festival of Gwrddelw, and in Nicolas Roscarrock as that of Gwrthelu.

S. GWRDDOGWY, see S. GUORDOCUI

S. GWRFAED, see S. GURMAET

S. GWRFAN, see S. GUORVAN

S. GWRFWY, see S. GUORBOE

S. GWRFYW, Confessor

GWRFYW, or Gorfyw, was the son of Pasgen ab Urien Rheged, and father of S. Nidan.⁴ He is said to have a church dedicated to him in Anglesey, but its situation does not appear to be now known. There was formerly a Capel Gorfyw at Bangor, but it has long since disappeared.⁵

A Gurbiu occurs as a clerical witness to a Monmouthshire grant to Llandaff in the time of Bishop Oudoceus.⁶ The name is evidently the same as the Breton Gorfé of Locorvé, at Plouray (Morbihan) and Glomel (Côtes-du-Nord).

¹ Lan Gwrddeluu occurs in the Cartulary of Landevennec, p. 41.

² P. 426.

³ P. 117.

⁴ Iolo MSS., p. 102.

⁵ Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 285; Y Gwyllydydd, 1832, p. 162; Myv. Arch., p. 426.

⁶ P. 150. Gwrfyw is to be distinguished from Gwrfwy (Guorboe).

St. Gwrfyw, see Asser

Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 484. D. (Ælfredus) sed quoniam benignus dominus inter ceteros, cum Cornubiam venisset advent. et. p. andiam c. d. eorum orandi causa dicitur in sua S. Gwrfyw representat, et unum etiam S. Nidan (Gwrfyw p. 150), collectus est, cum in adulas sancton

S. GWRGI

THE Iolo MSS. reckon Gwrgi, the son of Elifer Gosgorddfawr, among the Welsh saints, but as those documents are of late compilation, and as there is no other evidence to support this, his inclusion is extremely doubtful. He and his brother Peredur are therein said to have been "saints" or monks of Bangor Illtyd at Llantwit, Peredur being penrhaith, or principal. He is also mentioned as being of Côt Dochau, at Llandough, near Cardiff, and to have founded the church of Penarth.¹

One of the stanzas forming the "Sayings of the Wise" says: ²—

Hast thou heard the saying of Gwrgi, Counselling on the Sunday?
 "The lucky (or happy) needs but to be born."
 (Nid rhaid i ddedwydd namyn ei eni.)

Gwrgi figures rather as a character that is partly historical and partly mythical. The Triads have a good deal to say about him. His mother, Eurddyl (the Euerdil of the Cognatio de Brychan), the daughter of Cynfarch Gul and sister of Urien Rheged, gave birth to triplets, Gwrgi, Peredur and Ceindrech Benasgell.³ He and others formed the "horse-load" that rode on their horse Cornan (or Corfan) to see the funeral pile of Gwenddolau at Arderydd,⁴ now Arthuret, where the latter had been slain in battle, in 573. Another Triad⁵ speaks of Gwrgi and Peredur as being deserted in battle by their retinue at Caer Greu and of both being killed by Eda Glinmawr, Nennius's Aetan or Eata Glinmaur of Deira. This was in 580.⁶ According to the Verses of the Graves the grave of Gwrgi, "the lion of Gwynedd's braves," is in Gower.⁷

S. GWRGON, see S. GWRYGON GODDEU.

S. GWRHAI or GWRAI, Confessor

GWRHAI, or Gwrai, was one of the many sons of Caw, or as his name is given in Gwrhai's pedigree, Cadw.⁸ He is said to have been a "saint"

¹ Pp. 105, 128, 221. "Gwrci presbiter Sancti Catoci" signs two grants to Llandaff during the episcopate of Herwald, who was consecrated in 1056 (Book of Llan Dâw, pp. 272-3). The name occurs in Breton as Gurhi and in Irish as Ferchu, and means "man-dog." The Irish Ferchon (the genitive of Ferchu) is represented in Welsh by Gwrgon. ² Iolo MSS., p. 253; Myv. Arch., p. 129.

³ Myv. Arch., p. 392. Elifer had seven sons in all (Black Bk. of Carmarthen, ed. Evans, p. 5).

⁴ Myv. Arch., pp. 394, 396; Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 301.

⁵ Myv. Arch., pp. 390, 398, 408; Mabinogion, p. 305.

⁶ Annales Cambriæ, p. 5. ⁷ Black Bk. of Carmarthen, ed. Evans, p. 66.

⁸ Hafod MS. 16 (c. 1400); Myv. Arch., p. 425; Cambro-British Saints, pp.

or monk of Bangor Deiniol in Carnarvonshire and to have settled at Penstrowed, in Arwystli, near Newtown, Montgomeryshire, and founded the little church there.¹ See under SS. GARAI and LLONIO.

Gwrai, son of Glywys, was the eponym of Gurinid,² or Gorwenydd, which formed one of the nine divisions of the old principality of Glywysing. It is his sepulchrum and mons, in S. Bride's Major, that are mentioned in the Book of Llan Dâu.³

S. GWRHIR, Confessor

THIS saint's pedigree is not given. He is styled Gwas Teilo, the Servant of Teilo, and is said to have been a "saint" of Bangor Catwg, at Llanccarfan.⁴ He was the original patron of Llysfaen or Lisvane, under Llanishen, near Cardiff, now dedicated to S. Denis. He is mentioned as a bard; and a Triad⁵ states that "Gwrhir, Teilo's Bard at Llandaff," was one of "the Three Cynfebydd (or Primitive Bachelors) of the Isle of Britain," whatever the precise meaning of that may be. The other two were Tydain Tad Awen and Menyw Hên, which places him in rather mythical company. S. Ystyffan is also accounted a Bard of Teilo.

One of the "Sayings of the Wise" stanzas is as follows:⁶

Hast thou heard the saying of Gwrhir,
The Servant of Teilo, a bard of truthful language?
"Whoso deceives shall be deceived."
(A wnel dwyll ef a dwyllir).

S. GWRIN, Confessor

GWRIN was the son of Cynddilig ab Nwython ab Gildas,⁷ but of him next to nothing is known. He is patron of Llanwrin, in Mont-

268-9; Iolo MSS., pp. 102, 136. The name occurs as Guorai, Gurhai, and Gurai in the Book of Llan Dâu.

¹ B. Willis, Bangor, p. 278, who is followed by most others, is wrong in giving its patron as Gwrci.

² Cambro-British Saints, p. 22, 53.

³ Pp. 176, 190; Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, 305.

⁴ Iolo MSS., p. 107.

⁵ Myv. Arch., p. 409. For Gwrhyr, "Interpreter of Tongues," see Sir J. Rhys, Hibbert Lectures, p. 489, and Celtic Folklore, pp. 511-2.

⁶ Iolo MSS., p. 255.

⁷ Iolo MSS., pp. 137, 139. His name occurs in the Guurgint barmb truch of gomeryshire, which had been previously dedicated to SS. Ust and Dyfnig. In the Iolo MSS. he is stated to have been a saint at Trefwrin or Wrinston, the Castle of which and part of the Manor are in the parish of Wenvoe, near Cardiff.

His festival does not occur in the calendars, but Browne Willis says of Llanwrin that it is dedicated to "S. Wrin, November 1, tho' the Wake is kept May 1." ¹

S. GWRMAEL, Confessor

GWRMAEL, or, as we should expect his name to be written, Gwrfael, is said to have been the son of Cadfrawd (saint and bishop) ab Cadfan (ab Cynan) ab Eudaf ab Caradog ab Brân.² He was brother to Cadgyfarch, saint and bishop, the patron of Bryn Buga or Usk. The church of Gwrmael is said to be that of Caerloyw or Gloucester.

Gwrmael's pedigree is so mythical that his existence is very doubtful.

S. GWRNERTH, Confessor

GWRNERTH was the son of S. Llywelyn ab Tegonwy ab Teon ab Gwineu Deufreuddwyd.³ In one entry in the *Iolo MSS.*⁴ he is given a brother, Gwyddfarch, a saint of Bangor Cybi, in Anglesey. Both Gwrnerth and his father are said to be of Trallwng, i.e. Welshpool, Montgomeryshire.

There is a religious dialogue, in verse, between Gwrnerth and his father in the fourteenth-century Red Book of Hergest (col. 1026), the composition of which is attributed to S. Tyssilio.⁵ It bears the following inscription—"Llywelyn and Gwrnerth were two penitent saints at Trallwng in Powys; and it was their custom to meet the old Welsh pedigrees in Harleian MS. 3859, which would now be Gwrin Farf drwch, but out of whose name has been evolved the mythical Gwrgant Farf drwch.

¹ Bangor, p. 361; Parochiale Anglic., p. 221.

² Iolo MSS., pp. 116, 136.

³ Peniarth MSS. 12, 16, 45; Myv. Arch., pp. 416, 426; Cambro-British Saints pp. 267, 270; Iolo MSS., pp. 107, 129 (at the former reference he is made a brother to Llywelyn).

⁴ P. 104.

⁵ Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, pp. 237-241.

together during the last three hours of the night and the first three hours of the day to say their Matins (Pylgeint) and the Hours of the day besides. And once upon a time Llywelyn, seeing the cell of Gwrnerth shut, and not knowing why it was so, composed an englyn." A postscript adds—"Tyssilio, the son of Brochwael Ysgythrog, composed these verses concerning Gwrnerth's coming to perform his devotions with S. Llywelyn, his companion; and they are called the Colloquy of Llywelyn and Gwrnerth."

The inscription, if not the poem itself, cannot be much older than the MS. in which it occurs. The poem consists of thirty triplet verses, nearly half of which begin with the catchwords Eiry mynyd (Mountain snow), which occur also in a similar poem, but not religious, that follows it. In the poem one addresses the other as "brother," but in the postscript they are spoken of as companions.

The festival of Gwrnerth and his father Llywelyn is on April 7, and occurs in the majority of the Welsh calendars.

No church is attributed to Gwrnerth as patron. The speedwell is called in Welsh both gwrnerth and llyisiau Llywelyn (whence the English fluellen) from these two saints, as suggested long ago by Dr. John Davies in his Botanologium, 1632.

S. GWRTHEFYR (VORTIMER), Prince, Martyr

GWRTHEFYR Fendigaid ("the Blessed"),¹ the son of Vortigern or Gwrtheyrn Gwrtheneu, is accounted a saint and a martyr, but nothing is known of him beyond what is related by Nennius. "Vortimer, the son of Vortigern, valiantly fought against Hengest, Horsa, and his people; he drove them to the isle of Thanet, and thrice enclosed them within it; and beset them on the Western side." The Irish Nennius says, "The Britons took this island thrice from them," and says nothing of any movement to the West.

"The Saxons now despatched deputies to Germany to solicit large reinforcements, and an additional number of ships: having obtained these, they fought against the kings and princes of Britain, and sometimes extended their boundaries by victory, and sometimes were conquered and driven back.

¹ Vortimer is in old Welsh Guorthemir, becoming later Gwrthefyr. The name Vortiporius of Gildas appears as Guortepir in the old Welsh genealogies in Harleian MS. 3859, and later in Jesus College MS. 20 as Gwrdeber. The two are liable to be confused.

“Four times did Vortimer valorously encounter the enemy; the first has been mentioned, the second was upon the river Darent, the third at the Ford, in their language called Epsford, though in ours Setthirgabail, there Horsa fell, and Catigern, the son of Vortigern; the fourth battle he fought was near the Stone on the shore of the Gallic sea, where the Saxons, being defeated, fled to their ships.

“After a short interval Vortimer died; before his decease, anxious for the future prosperity of his country, he charged his friends to inter his body at the entrance of the Saxon port, to wit, upon the rock where the Saxons first landed; ‘for though,’ said he, ‘they may inhabit other parts of Britain, yet, if you follow my commands, they will never remain in this island.’ They imprudently disobeyed this last injunction and neglected to bring him where he had appointed.”

In the Irish Nennius it stands somewhat differently, “a battle on the bank of the Deirgbeint; a battle on the bank of Rethenergabail, in which Orsa and Catigern, son of Gortigern, were slain; and a battle on the shore of the Ictian Sea (the Channel), where they drove the Saxons to their ships, muliebriter; and a battle on the banks of Episfort.”

We may follow this struggle better from Mr. Green’s account of The Making of England, though he does not even allude to the gallant Vortigern. “In the first years that followed after their landing, Jute and Briton fought side by side; and the Picts are said to have at last been scattered to the winds in a great battle on the eastern coast of Britain. But danger from the Pict was hardly over when danger came from the Jutes themselves. Their numbers probably grew fast as the news of their settlement in Thanet spread among their fellow pirates who were haunting the Channel; and with the increase of their number must have grown the difficulty of supplying them with rations and pay.

“The dispute which rose over these questions was at last closed by Hengest’s men with a threat of war. But the threat was no easy one to carry out. Right across their path in any attack upon Britain stretched the inlet of sea that parted Thanet from the mainland, a strait which was then traversable only at low water by a long and dangerous ford and guarded at either mouth by fortresses.”

That they did attempt to cross, and were met and driven back by Vortimer, we learn from Nennius, but Mr. Green entirely disregards his testimony. Here was fought the first battle; and the Jutes when foiled summoned aid from Germany.

By some means, however, when so reinforced, they succeeded in crossing; probably they took the Britons by surprise, as some time had elapsed before the assistance arrived, and the Britons had withdrawn in fatal security.

“The inlet may have been crossed before any force could be collected to oppose the English onset, or the boats of the Jutes may have pushed from the centre of it up the channel of its tributary, the Stour, itself at that time a wide and navigable estuary, to the town that stood on the site of our Canterbury, the town of Durovernum. Durovernum had grown up among the marshes of the Stour, a little cluster of houses raised above the morass on a foundation of piles . . . and the military importance of its position was marked by the rough oval of massive walls that lay about it. . . . But neither wall nor marshes saved Durovernum from Hengest’s onset, and the town was left in blackened and solitary ruin, as the invaders pushed along the road to London.

“No obstacle seems to have checked their march from the Stour to the Medway. Passing over the heights which were crowned with the forest of Blean, they saw the road strike like an arrow past the line of Frodsham Creek through a rich and fertile district, where country-houses and farms clustered thickly on either side of it, and where the burnt grain which is still found among their ruins may tell of the smoke-track that marked the Jutish advance. As they passed the Swale, however, and looked to their right over the potteries whose refuse still strews the mud-banks of Upchurch, their march seems to have swerved abruptly to the south. . . . The march of the Jutes bent along a ridge of low hills which forms the bound of the river-valley on the east. The country through which it led them was full of memories of a past which had even then faded from the minds of men; for the hill-slopes which they traversed were the grave-ground of a vanished race, and scattered among the boulders that strewed the soil rise cromlechs and large barrows of the dead. One mighty relic survives in the monument now called Kit’s Coty House, a cromlech which had been linked in old days by an avenue of huge stones to a burial ground some few miles off near the village of Addington. It was from a steep knoll on which the grey, weather-beaten stones of this monument were reared, that the view of their battleground would break on Hengest’s warriors; and a lane which still leads down from it through peaceful homesteads would guide them across the river-valley to a ford which has left its name in the village of Aylesford that overhangs it. At this point, which is still the lowest ford across the Medway, and where an ancient trackway crossed the river, the British leaders must have taken post for the defence of West Kent; but the Chronicle of the conquering people tells nothing of the rush that may have carried the ford, or of the fight that went straggling up the village. We hear only that Horsa fell in the moment of victory; and the flint-heap of Horstead, which has long preserved his name, and was held in aftertime to mark his grave, is thus the earliest of those monuments of English valour of which Westminster is the last and noblest shrine."

After this success the conquerors pressed on, and the Britons made another stand on the Darent, and here apparently the natives were victorious, for the Jutes retired, and did not make further advance till the next year. But with the spring of 456 they were again on the move; a battle was fought "near the stone on the shore of the Gallic sea, where the Saxons being defeated, fled to their ships." This can hardly be Stone, between Dartford and the Thames, for both the Latin and the Irish Nennius speak of it as on the English Channel, and we may conjecture it was at Folkstone. Perhaps, instead of at once pushing towards London, the invaders ravaged the south of Kent.

In the following year, however, the decisive battle of Crayford, a ford in "a little stream that falls through a quiet valley from the chalk downs hard by at Orpington. The victory must have been complete, for, at its close, as the Chronicle of their conquerors tells us, the Britons 'forsook Kentland, and fled with much fear to London.'" ¹

Shortly after this disastrous battle, Vortimer died, probably of his wounds; and immediately after, the discontent and resentment of the Britons rose against Vortigern, and he was driven from his position as king, by his people, headed by Ambrosius Aurelius, and Germanus (afterwards Bishop of Man).²

Gwrthefyr does not seem to have founded any churches. Geoffrey of Monmouth says that he "restored churches" and he is followed by Matthew of Westminster and Henry of Huntingdon.

The name of Gwrthefyr does not occur in any Calendars.

In a Welsh Triad it is said that his bones formed one of the three "Precious Concealments" (Madgudd) of Britain, for as long as they were concealed in the chief harbours of the island no invasion of the Saxons could ever take place, but they were revealed by his father Gwrtheyrn, "for love of a woman."¹

¹ Green, The Making of England, London, 1897, i, pp. 35-41.

² Henry of Huntingdon tells the story differently, but we do not know what was his authority. He makes Ambrosius leader in the Battle of Aylesford, with Vortimer and Catigern under him. Matthew of Westminster does not make Ambrosius supreme till later; he also graphically describes the battle, but this is taken from Geoffrey of Monmouth. Geoffrey says that Vortimer was poisoned by Rowena, wife of Vortigern his father, and daughter of Hengest.

Among the "Sayings of the Wise" triplets occurs the following:²

Hast thou heard the saying of Gwrthefyr
The Blessed, of wise import?
"A string too tight is easily broken."
(Llyn rhy dynn hawdd y tyrr.)

S. GWRTHELI, see S. GWRDDELW

S. GWRTHWL, Confessor

Of this saint nothing is known. His name has come down to us in that of the church of Llanwrthwl, in North Breconshire. We have it also in Maes Llanwrthwl, the name of an old mansion in the parish of Caio, Carmarthenshire, not far from which, near Pantypolion, where the Paulinus stone originally stood, is Llech Wrthwl. Theophilus Jones doubtfully suggested³ as the person involved Morddal Gwr Gweilgi, whom the Triads⁴ state taught the Welsh people, in the time of Alexander the Great, the art of building in stone and mortar; but this is impossible, if for no other reason than that the initial letter would have to be G and not M. Ecton and Browne Willis give Mwthwl as the saint's name.

The most likely name approaching Gwrthwl that we can suggest is Gwrthmwl,⁵ which was borne by more than one person living at an early period. One was Gwrthmwl (or Gyrthmwl) Wledig, who, according to a Triad,⁶ was pen hynaiſ, or "chief elder," of "the throne-tribe" at Penrhyn Rhionedd in the North, which acknowledged Arthur as "supreme King." It may be inferred from another Triad⁷ that he was slain in Ceredigion.

March 2 is given as "Gwyl Wthwl" or "Wrthwl" in the Demetian Calendar (denominated S). The Prymers of 1618 and 1633 enter "Mwthwl" on the same day.

¹ Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 300; Myv. Arch., pp. 391, 396, 406.

² Iolo MSS., p. 255.

³ Breconshire, ed. 1898, p. 283. He is followed by Carlisle, Topog. Dict., 1811, and others.

⁴ Myv. Arch., p. 409.

⁵ The m should properly become f, as in gwrthfynegi, etc., and in such a position would further be liable to disappear, as in Cynfyw, Cynyw; Gredfyw, Gredyw.

⁶ Skene, Four Ancient Bks., ii, p. 456; Myv. Arch., pp. 389, 407. One Triad (e.g. Mabinogion, pp. 305-6), mentions his "carw (or tarw) ellyll." He occurs ibid., p. 160; cf. Skene, ii, p. 287.

⁷ E.g., Mabinogion, p. 301. According to one (no. 39) of the Englynion y Beddau, the grave of a certain Gyrthmul is in Kelli Uriaual, Briafael's Holt.

S. GWRW

THE name Eglwys Wrw, borne by a church in Pembrokeshire, would most naturally suggest Gwrw¹ as its patron saint, and it is for this reason alone that our notice has been placed, somewhat oddly, under the above heading. The name is spelt in a variety of forms. In the Valor of 1535² it is "Eglusero"; in the parish list in Peniarth MS. 147, c. 1566, "Eglwys Irw"; and by Owen in his *Pembrokeshire*³ "Eglosserowe," who also gives⁴ "Capell Erow" as a pilgrimage chapel in ruins in the same parish, which latter affords clear proof that the initial letter of the saint's name is a vowel, but whether E it is doubtful. Later writers give it as Erw and Eirw. The name clearly, despite the local etymologists, has nothing to do with erw, hence "the Church of an acre"; and to connect it with gwryw or gwrw, "male," would be absurd.

Nothing is known of the saint, not even the sex for certain. In the Demetian Calendar (S), the earliest MS. of which is Cwrtmawr MS. 44, written in the second half of the sixteenth century, the saint is designated "Virgin." Later writers say the male sex. Fenton,⁵ who took the latter view, says that in the reign of Queen Elizabeth there was a sort of chantry chapel in the churchyard, wherein, on the south side, was shown the tomb of the saint in hewn stone. The parishioners never buried in the chapel, from a superstitious belief that corpses there interred would in the night-time be ejected.

The saint's festival, which occurs only in the Calendar already mentioned, is entered as "Gwyl Urw (Wrw) Forwyn" on October 21. Fenton gives it on November 3, which is the festival of S. Cristiolus, and Carlisle, in his Topographical Dictionary, 1811, says the church is dedicated to that saint; but this is surely a mistake. A large fair, called Ffair Feugan, was held at Eglwys Wrw on the Monday after Martinmas, O.S.; but Meugan was the great saint of the deanery of Kemes.

S. GWRYD, Friar

IN the Demetian Calendar (S) occurs the following entry, "Gwryd the Friar (Y Brawd Wryd) on All Saints' Day. This Friar drove

¹ Sir J. Rhys, Welsh Englyn, 1905, pp. 23-4, is disposed to connect the Gwrw of Eglwys Wrw with the Irish gorm, "conspicuous, famous."

² lv, p. 399.

³ i, pp. 288, 298, 312, 398, etc.

⁴ i, p. 509.

⁵ Pembrokeshire, 1811, pp. 531-2.

the oppression (gormes) from Einion ab Gwalchmai, which had been following him for seven years." ¹ We are not told what the oppression was, but, inferentially, something mental.

Einion ab Gwalchmai ab Meilir was a bard of Trefeilir, Anglesey, who flourished circa 1170-1220. Five poems by him, mostly of a religious character, are printed in the Myvyrian Archaiology.²

In the *Iolo MSS.*³ occurs "The Fable of Einion ab Gwalchmai and the Lady of the Green Wood," by Hopkin ab Thomas of Gower, who lived at the end of the fourteenth century. In it Einion, who had married Angharad, the daughter of Ednyfed Fychan, is enticed away from his wife and son by a hideous goblin (ellylles), who appears to him in the form of a lady of surpassing beauty. The illusion is taken off him by "a man in white apparel, mounted on a snow-white horse," who brings him back, after an absence of twenty-nine years, to his wife on her wedding-day.

By the "oppression" referred to in the Calendar is evidently meant the illusion of the Fable, and the man in white would be Gwryd. He lived about the year 1200, an exceptionally late instance among the Welsh saints.

S. GWRYGON GODDEU, Matron

GWRYGON of Goddeu was a daughter of Brychan. In the Vespasian Cognatio her name is given as Gwrycon Godheu, in the Domitian version as Grucon Guedu, and in Jesus College MS. 20 as Grugon. In all the later lists of Brychan's children her name is spelt Gwrgon.⁴ She was the wife of Cadrod Calchfynydd, Lord of Calchfynydd, which Skene has identified with Kelso in Roxburghshire.⁵ He identified Goddeu with Cadyow, near Hamilton.⁶

¹ Gwryd is not a name of frequent occurrence. A certain "Gwryd ap gwryd glav" was buried at Maes y Caerau, near Dinas Emrys (Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., ii, p. 355; see also pp. 369, 453). Hafod Wryd is a place in the Machno Valley, near Bettws y Coed.

² Pp. 230-2; Stephens, Literature of the Kymry, 1876, pp. 48-51.

³ Pp. 176-9. The same story is told of Ednyfed Fychan, whose daughter Einion had married. With variants, it is a widely spread folk-tale. Tennyson's Enoch Arden is a well-known instance.

⁴ Peniarth MS. 75 (sixteenth century); Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 426; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 120, 140. "Tynwedd Faglog violated her at Rhydau Tynwedd" (first reference). In Peniarth MS. 131 (fifteenth century) she is called Gwenfrewi by mistake. Gwrgon is a man's name.

⁵ Four Ancient Books, i, pp. 172-3. See ii, p. 42, of this work.

⁶ Ibid., ii, p. 414. Sir J. Rhys, Celtic Britain, 1904, p. 156, says that "it was possibly Lothian but more likely Galloway."

Gwrygon's name occurs in the Cair Guricon of the Catalogue of Cities in Nennius (§ 76), the Old-Welsh name of Viroconium (Uriconium), whence our Wrox-eter and Wrekin.¹ The Roman town is supposed to date from about A.D. 50.

No churches are known to be dedicated to Gwrygon, nor does her name occur in any of the Calendars.

S. GWYAR, Confessor

IN one document printed in the *Iolo MSS.*² Gwyar is mentioned as one of the "twelve sons of Helig ab Glanog, of Tyno Helig, in the North, whose lands the sea overwhelmed; and they became saints at Bangor Fawr in Maelor; afterwards some of them went to Côr Cadfan in Bardsey. They lived in the time of Rhun ab Maelgwn," that is, about the middle of the sixth century.

This is the only entry wherein his name occurs, and his existence must rest entirely upon this document, printed from a transcript made in 1783.

S. GWYDDALUS, Martyr

IN the parish of Dihewyd (subject to Llanerchaeron), in Cardiganshire is a place called Llanwyddalus, well-known formerly for its great fair held on April 26 (O.S.), later May 9. It preserves the name of a now extinct church or chapel dedicated to S. Gwyddalus or Gwyddalys, whom some regard as a Welsh saint, but Browne Willis,³ Meyrick,⁴ and others treat the name as the Welsh form of Vitalis, whose festival they give on April 28. He is thus identified with the S. Vitalis, who, with his wife Valeria, was martyred in the second century, and are commemorated together on April 28. He is venerated at Ravenna, where he suffered martyrdom. But we should hardly expect to find a comparatively obscure Roman saint culted in the ¹ Y Cymmrodor, ix, p. 183; xi, p. 49; xxi. The Dinlle Urecon of Llywarch Hên's Elegy to Cynddylan was probably the camp on the Wrekin.

² P. 124.

³ Parochiale Anglicanum, 1733, p. 193. In a list of parishes, written in 1606, the parish-name is given as "ll. Vitalis" (Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 916).

⁴ Cardiganshire, 1808, pp. 43, 46, 185.

wilds of Cardiganshire. Besides, it would have been impossible for Vitalis to assume in Welsh the form Gwyddalus at any period down to the late Middle Ages. In Old-Welsh the equivalent of Vitalis was Guitaul, the name of Vortigern's father or grandfather, which became later Gwidawl and Gwidol, as in the "Ellyll Gwidawl" of the Triads, and the brook that has given its name to Aber Gwidol, on the Dovey. However, the identification of Gwyddalus with Vitalis is at least as old as the sixteenth century, and the church of Dihewyd is to-day given as dedicated to S. Vitalis.

The saint's festival, which only occurs in the Demetian Calendar (S), is entered as "Gwyl Fidalis ¹ [martyr] a Bidofydd," on April 26, on which day, it is added, was a fair. The fair was known far and wide as "Ffair Dalis Fawr." ² When Lampeter became a railway centre it gradually migrated thither, where it is still a very prosperous fair, extending over three days.

The water supply of the village of Dihewyd comes from the Saint's Holy Well, Ffynnon Dalis, near the village, above which formerly stood a small chapel.

S. GWYDDELAN, Confessor

THE pedigree of this saint is not given, but his festival, August 22, occurs in a good number of the Welsh Calendars from the sixteenth century downwards. He is the patron of Llanwyddelan, in Montgomeryshire, and Dolwyddelan (sometimes, but wrongly, written Dolydd Elen, "Elen's Meadows"), in Carnarvonshire.³ The former church has been guessed by Browne Willis⁴ and others to be dedicated to a S. Gwendolina, with festival on October 18. There is a holy well in Dolwyddelan, near Gelli'r Pentref, commonly called Ffynnon Elan, which was originally covered with a small building. Its water is

¹ F is properly a mutation of B or M, but it here evidently represents V. There was a Fidelis, a disciple of SS. Dubricius and Teilo, who is coupled with a disciple whose name may probably be represented to-day by Llywel (Book of Llan Dâu, pp. 115, 126-7). There is an inscription to a certain Vitalis at Caerleon. Vitalis is another form of the name.

² Dalis points to Vi-talis. For the aphæresis cf. Llan Dogo (on the Wye), for Llan Euddogwy (= Oudoceus), seiet for society, taten for pytaten, etc.

³ The early spellings of Dolwyddelan invariably end in an; e.g. the "Ecc'a de Doluythelan" of the Norwich Taxatio, 1254; the Record of Caernarvon, pp. 9-11, 211; and the rhyme syllable in mediæval poetry. With the name cf. Dolbadarn. Gwyddelan means "the little Irishman"; cf. the Gwyddelyn of Trioeedd Arthur a'i Wyr. See what is said under S. LLORCAN.

⁴ Bangor, 1721, p. 360; Bacon, Liber Regis, 1786, p. 1,047.

said to possess tonic qualities and to steam slightly in frosty weather. It was considered beneficial especially for weakly children and paralyzed limbs. Cloch Wyddelan, a handbell, made of sheet metal, and supposed to have belonged to S. Gwyddelan, is now preserved at Gwydir, Llanrwst.

S. GWYDDFARCH, Confessor

GWYDDFARCH was the son of Amalarus or Malarus, who is described as "tywyssawc y Pwyl," literally, "Prince of the Pwyl."¹ "Y Pwyl" is probably the Welsh modification of the French La Pouille, for Apulia (Puglia), in South Italy, and does not mean Poland, Holland, or Welshpool as has been variously suggested.

Gwyddfarch was the founder of Eglwys Gwyddfarch (or Wyddfarch) in Meifod, Montgomeryshire, which has now entirely disappeared. The local legend speaks of him as an anchorite, who had his rocky bed, Gwely Gwyddfarch, on the slope of Gallt yr Ancr, the Anchorite's Hill, a bold eminence standing out above the village and commanding a magnificent view, and it was his warning voice, soon after his death, heard in the dead of night, that determined the precise spot whereon the church of Meifod should be built. He breathed his last in his Gwely. So the current tradition.² The Gwely, to-day, is a trench some eight yards in length.

Eglwys Gwyddfarch stood, according to the Meifod terriers of 1631 and 1663, on the west side of the present churchyard, just outside the wall, and had a small churchyard attached to it. At the date of the earlier terrier it was inhabited as a cottage, with its churchyard converted into gardens. This church, so called, was merely an oratory which was soon to be superseded by the more imposing edifice erected by S. Tyssilio. Besides these two churches another, Eglwys Fair, was consecrated on the spot in 1155. The churchyard encloses about four acres.³

There is a grant of 1467, by several cardinals, of a remission of 100 days to those who should repair to the chapel of S. Gwyddfarch, ¹ Peniarth MSS. 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16; Hanesyn Hên, pp. 34 ("or Pwyl"), 117 ("Afalarus"); Llanstephan MS. 28 ("Maclarus"); Myv. Arch., p. 426; Cambro-British Saints, p. 267; Iolo MSS., p. 104. His name, which is totemistic, is occasionally written Gwythfarch. Marchwydd is a transposition of the name-elements. Yr Hên Gyrys o Iâl, the early collector of Welsh proverbs, is sometimes called Gwyddfarch Gyfarwydd. As a common noun it means a wooden horse, and occurs in poetry as an epithet for a ship.

² Gwaith Gwallter Mechain, 1868, iii, pp. 95-100.

³ Archdeacon Thomas, Hist. of Dio. S. Asaph, i (1908), pp. 496-7.

Abbot and Confessor, or to the cemetery at Chirk of S. Tyssilio, and perform certain acts of devotion.¹ The local tradition, however, always speaks of him as an anct, an anchorite or recluse.

At the end of the eighteenth century there was in the chancel window of the present church a legend containing the invocation, "Scte Guydvarch."

His festival occurs in none of the Welsh Calendars but that in Llanstephan MS. 117, of the middle of the sixteenth century, where "Gwyddyfarch" is entered against November 3.

According to the Life of S. Tyssilio or Suliau, preserved by Albert le Grand, Gwyddfarch was abbot of Meifod.²

Tyssilio, who had no love for a military life, came to Meifod to study letters and enjoy the peace of the religious life.

Brochwel would not hear of his son becoming a monk, but at the earnest solicitation of Tyssilio, Gwyddfarch consented to shear his head and invest him with the habit, and then, to escape from pursuit, fled to Ynys Suliau, where he spent seven years.

When this period was over Gwyddfarch recalled him, and informed him that it was his desire to make a pilgrimage to Rome. Tyssilio, thinking that trouble would ensue should the abbot quit Meifod, entreated him to remain, but Gwyddfarch had set his mind on the journey. However, one day when the two were together, the abbot was weary, lay down and went to sleep, and dreamed that he had seen a great city with churches and palaces. When he awoke he said that he had seen as much of Rome as he wanted, and that he would take his pupil's advice and remain at home.

Not long after this Gwyddfarch died, and was succeeded as abbot by Tyssilio.

This took place before the battle of Bangor Iscoed and the fall of Chester, which was in 613; and we may place the death of Gwyddfarch as occurring about the year 610.

Another Gwyddfarch is entered as a Welsh saint in one of the pedigrees (written circa 1670) printed in the *Iolo MSS.*³ He is given as a son of S. Llywelyn of Trallwng or Welshpool, and brother of S. Gwrnerth, and said to have been a saint of Bangor Cybi, in Anglesey. Nothing is known of him.

¹ Arch. Camb., 1880, p. 150. Ibid., 1879, p. 291, it is suggested that Gwyddfarch may have been the hermit whom the British bishops consulted before giving their reply to Augustine.

² Albert le Grand, Vies des Saints de Bretagne, ed. 1901, pp. 841-3. The Life was taken from one extant in Le Grand's time in the Church of S. Suliac on the Rance, above S. Malo; also from the Breviary lessons of the churches of Léon and Folgoët in nine lections.

³ P. 104.

S. GWYDDLEW, Confessor

GWYDDLEW was, according to the Iolo MSS.,¹ a son of Gwynllyw Filwr, and a saint or monk of his brother's Côr at Llancarfan. He is therein said to be the father of a female S. Cannen; but, as Gwyddlyw, in another entry,² the father of a male S. Canneu.

If we may equate his brother Glywys Cernyw with Gluvias on the Fal, we may perhaps consider Gwyddlew as represented by S. Wyllow on the Foye at Llanteglos. William of Worcester, who calls him Vylloc or Wyllow, says that he was an Irishman, that he lived as a hermit; and was murdered by a kinsman, Mellyn. After his head was cut off, he rose and carried it from the bridge of S. Willow to Lanteglos church.

If Wyllow be Gwyddlew he was not Irish, but his mother was Gwladys, daughter of Brychan, and he was consequently half Irish.

The Feast at Lanteglos, according to William of Worcester, is on the Thursday before Pentecost.

A cave is shown on S. Wyllow's Hill, by Lanteglos, in which he is traditionally said to have lived.

S. GWYDDLOYW, Bishop, Confessor

GWODLOYW, or GWYDDLOYW, was a son of Glywys Cernyw, the Gluvias, as we conjecture, of Cornwall, and a nephew of S. Cadoc, is the grandfather of Gwodloyw was Gwynllyw Filwr, King of Gwynlywg. According to the *Iolo MSS.*³ he was "Bishop of Llandaff, and before that confessor to the saints in Côr Catwg," i.e. Llancarfan. It is tempting to identify him with the Gudwal, a native of Britain, who fled to Llydaw, when his native land was a prey to the sword and pestilence (see under S. Gudwal), but the final syllables are not favourable to the identification. It is, however, remarkable that Gudwal should have been at Cadoc's foundation in Broweroc, and should have been there as much junior to Cadoc, who, if the identification could be established, would be his uncle.

A namesake Gwydlonius, but certainly not the same man, as he lived much later, appears as the eleventh Bishop of Llandaff in the catalogue of the Bishops of that see in the Book of Llan Dâw,⁴ but this list is unreliable, and was conjecturally drawn up. The name of a Bishop Guodloiu, no doubt the same person, appears in a

¹ P. 130.

² Ibid., p. 108.

³ P. 130.

⁴ Pp. 303, 311.

single charter, and in it no name of a contemporary King is given. But among the witnesses who signed with him are some who can be fixed at a much later period than that of the son of Glywys Cernyw.¹ The Welsh do not account Gwodloyw or Gwyddloyw as a founder. The late and not very trustworthy reference to him in the Iolo MSS. evidently confounds the earlier with the later Gwodloyw.

S. GWYDDNO (GOUEZNOU), Abbot, Bishop, Confessor

THIS saint, invoked in the tenth-century Celtic Litanies as Woednovius, is now called in Breton Goueznou, as is also Gwethenoc, the half-brother of S. Winwaloe.

The authorities for his Life are a MS. translation of his Acts from the Léon Breviary in the Bibl. Nat. Paris, Français 22321, p. 733; a Life in Albert le Grand from the Lessons in the Léon Breviary and the Legendaria of Léon and Folgoat. Also a rhythmic composition by William, Chaplain to the Bishop of Léon, Eudes, to whom he dedicated it, in 1019.

Gwyddno was born in the Isle of Britain. He lost his mother, and when he was aged 18, his father Tugdon resolved on quitting his native land and settling in Armorica. He accordingly started, taking with him his son Gwyddno and his daughter Tugdonia, and his eldest son, Majan.

They probably landed in the harbour of Brest, for there still exists a chapel in the parish of Guipavas called S. Toudon, sometimes corrupted into Saint-Hudon.

Majan settled at a place called Loc Majan in the parish of Plouguin, but Gwyddno planted his lann near Brest, where the parish still bears his name.

One day, Conmore, Regent of Domnonia, who had not as yet embroiled himself with the saints, was hunting near Brest when he came upon Gwyddno, and, taking a liking to him, told him he might appropriate as much land as he could dyke round in a day.

Gwyddno summoned Majan to him, and the brothers started with a fork which they dragged behind them, and as they advanced, the soil miraculously rose on one side in a bank and formed a trench on the other. By this means they enclosed a square area of about two leagues.

¹ Book of Llan Dáv, p. 168. On the next page his name is spelt Guidlouius.

The miracle is an invention and embellishment. Conmore marked out for Gwyddno the limits of his minihi, and thenceforth, as Albert le Grand informs us, it became a sanctuary and place of refuge to all kinds of malefactors. Having found a spring of good water, Gwyddno set his brother to clean it out, enclose it and form a stone basin into which it might flow and be retained. This Holy Well still exists, and is much resorted to; it was reconstructed at the end of the sixteenth century.

Gwyddno one day begged of a woman some cheeses. She replied that she had none, which was false. When the saint had departed, she found her cheeses turned to stone. These pebbles—for they were round like seaworn pebbles—were long preserved in the church of Lan-Gouezenou. They were actually cursing stones to be turned by any one who desired to bring down evil on another, whilst formulating his wish. But when this practice passed into oblivion, the story was made up to account for them. There is a set of them still to be seen at Lanrivoaré, and many remain in different “cursing wells” and “cursing stations” in Ireland.

As Gwyddno objected to female society, he set up a great stone as a demarcation beyond which no woman was to pass.¹

Houardon, Bishop of Léon, fell ill and died, and Gwyddno was chosen to succeed him. The date of this event cannot be fixed. Gwyddno ruled the church of Léon for twenty-four years. At the end of this time he went to visit S. Corbasius, where is now the town of Quimperlé and where the saint was constructing a monastery. As the bishop was standing under the planks of the scaffold on which the workmen were standing, one of them let fall his hammer, and it struck Gwyddno on the head, broke in his skull and killed him. He died on October 25.

The usual date given for the death of Gwyddno is 675, but this is clearly impossible, as he received his grant of land from Conmore before 550. The biographers were embarrassed by this difficulty and supposed a second Conmore, son of the first, but history knows of no other. The Chronicon Briocense calls him the pestilent Conmore.²

¹ “Fæminarum imprimis contubernium, familiaritatemque sic abhorrebat ut ne accessum quidem ad sui cænobii septa iis, ullo modo, permitteret, præfixo utique termino, quem ultra progredi nefas esset.” Lect. Brev. Léon.

² “Conmore pestifera, quamvis homo pessimæ conditionis esset, plurimas tamen dedisti possessiones et franchisas religioso viro sancto Goueznovo et ejus ecclesiæ in territorio Ossimorensi sita.” The Chron. Brioc. is so late that it is not of much authority, but in this instance it may have followed the lost Life more faithfully than Albert le Grand, who saw the chronological difficulty.

Under these circumstances it is impossible to determine approximately even the date of Gwyddno's death. S. Goueznou's day is October 25 in the Brev. Leon., 1516 and 1736, and the Brev. Corisop., 1835.

The saint is very liable to be confounded with Goueznou, Gwethenoc, son of Fracan and Gwen Teirbron, but he can be distinguished if we bear in mind that the Goueznou found in Côtes du Nord is Gwethenoc, and that the saint of this same degraded form of name in Léon is Gwyddno.

Gwyddno or Goueznou is invoked as Guidnove in the tenth-century Litany in the Library of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury, and in that at S. Vougai, and as Guodnou in the eleventh-century Litany published by D'Arbois de Jubainville.¹

He is mentioned in the Life of S. Paul of Léon under the name of Woednovius, "qui alio nomine Towoedocus vocabatur,"² as having been a priest under S. Paul. Under this form, corrupted to Touezec, he is patron of a chapel near S. Briec.³

In Cornwall we have his name perhaps in the parish of Perran Uthno, otherwise Little Perran, near Marazion, called Lanuthnoe in Bishop Bronescombe's Register at Exeter, and Udnou Parva in the Taxatio of 1291, where we also find a Lanudno, now extinct, but is represented by the manor of Lan Uthno, in the parish of S. Erth.⁴

In the *Iolo MSS.*⁵ Gwyddno Garanhir, of the race of Maxen Wledig, is included among the Welsh Saints. His territory, Cantre'r Gwaelod (the Lowland Hundred), was overrun by the sea, and now lies in Cardigan Bay. There is no foundation whatever for regarding him as a Welsh saint.

S. GWYDDYN, Hermit

GWYDDYN, or Gwddyn, is only known to legend as a hermit⁶ at Llanwddyn, in Montgomeryshire. Gwely Wddyn, his Bed or Grave,

¹ Revue Celtique, 1890, pp. 137, 142.

² Vita S. Pauli Leonensis, ed. Plaine, p. 28.

³ J. Loth in Revue Celtique, 189, op. 143.

⁴ Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, p. 246.

⁵ P. 138; cf. p. 145. Gwyddno seems to mean "skilled in wood"; cf. Tudno, Machno, etc. A bye-form of the name is Gwyddneu.

⁶ Sometimes he is made to be a giant, who lived here. A brook, sometimes called Nant Owddyn, is a tributary of the Vyrnwy, and flows by Gwely Wddyn. It is generally called Ceunant Pistyll.

is a smooth mound on a hill, a little to the south of the now submerged village, on the other side of the Vyrnwy. His cell is a recess in the rock not far from the Gwely. It is popularly believed that there are great treasures hidden about his cell, but every attempt at discovering them has been frustrated by tremendous storms of hail and thunder. A German miner named Hennings met with this experience in 1869. Llwybr Wddyn is the path, still traced over the mountain, along which it is said that he used to go to visit S. Melangell at Penant, five miles off. Sarn Wddyn, his causeway over the Vyrnwy near his Gwely is now beneath the lake.

To Gwyddyn was originally dedicated the church of Llanwyddyn or Llanwddyn, afterwards to S. John Baptist, the Patron Saint of the Knights Hospitallers. The manor, with the church, came into the possession of the Knights at an early date; hence the rededication. The site of the old village of Llanwddyn, with the church and churchyard, is now covered by Lake Vyrnwy, which supplies Liverpool with water. The church erected by the Corporation of that city to replace it is situated about two miles from the old site, near the crest of a hill overlooking the great embankment. It was consecrated in 1888, when the original dedication was restored.

Llanwddin, or Llanwdden, was the name of one of the two ancient townships of Llangystenin, in Carnarvonshire, and may possibly preserve the designation of an extinct chapel dedicated to Gwyddyn.

SS. GWYN, GWYNO, GWYNORO, CELYNIN, and CEITHO, Confessors

IN the Demetian Calendar (S), of which the earliest known copy is in Cwrtmawr MS. 44 (sixteenth century), occurs the following entry—“The Festival of the Five Saints (Y Pumpsaint) is on the Festival of All Saints. These five were brothers, who were born the same time, at one birth, of one woman. Their father was named Cynyr Farfryn, of the parish of Cynwyl Gaio, in Carmarthenshire; and their names were Gwyn, Gwyno, Gwynoro, Celynin, and Ceitho. Ceitho has a special Festival”¹ (August 5). Their Festival occurs in no other

¹ In the copy of the calendar in Panton MS. 10 (c. 1780) the words “er yn-weth” (at one time) of the Cwrtmawr copy have been read “i Erinwedd,” converting them into a name for their mother! Four out of the five brothers (Gwynoro omitted) are mentioned by Lewis Glyn Cothi (fifteenth century) in a verse of his Ode to Caio (Gwaith L. G. C., Oxf., 1837, p. 313). The editor’s notes, however, are entirely wrong. For the Celtic legend of Five, Seven, or more Saints born at one birth, see Owen’s Pembrokeshire, ii, pp. 409–12, and this work, ii, pp. 398–405.

Calendar on this day, but in the Additional MS. 14, 886 (1643-4) we have "Gwyl Pymsaint" against January 7, and this is the festival day which Browne Willis¹ gives for Llanpumpsaint. In the *Book of Llan Dâv*² they are called "Pimp Seint Kair Kaiau."

Their father has been supposed to be the same as Cynyr Farfdrwch, said to be the son of Gwron ab Cunedda,³ but this is a mistake; neither can he be identified, as has also been done, with Cynyr Farfog (or Ceinfarfog), the father of Cai, the Sir Kay the Seneschal of Arthurian romance, and from whom Caer Gai in Merionethshire derives its name. This latter Cynyr is associated with Penllyn, in which district Caer Gai is situated.

To the Five Saints is dedicated the church of Llanpumpsaint in Carmarthenshire; also, formerly, a chapel called Pumpsaint,⁴ in the parish of Cynwyl Gaio, in the same county. To Ceitho is dedicated Llangeitho, in Cardiganshire.

A curious legend connects the Five Saints with a large block of sandstone at Cynwyl Gaio called Carreg Pumpsaint. It stands upright at the foot of the hill below the Ogofau, the old Roman gold mines, and is shaped like a basalt column, with large artificial oval basin-shaped hollows on its sides. It is three and a half feet high and a little over two feet in width. The legend says that, time out of mind, there lived in the neighbourhood five saints who had a wide reputation for sanctity, and were objects of ill-will to a wicked magician who dwelt in caverns near. He had in vain tried to bring them into his power, until one day they happened to be crossing the Ogofau, and he, by his wicked enchantments, raised a terrific storm of thunder, lightning and hail, which beat upon and bruised the saints, and they laid their heads against a large boulder standing near for shelter. So great was the force of the hail that the impression of their heads can be seen to this day upon the four sides of the stone. The enchanter transported the saints into his caverns (the Ogofau) where they sleep. Tradition says they will awake, and come back to the light of day, when King Arthur returns, or when the Diocese is blessed with a truly pious and apostolic prelate!⁵

According to another version they were five young pilgrims on their way to the shrine of S. David, who, exhausted with fatigue, reposed on this pillow their weary heads which a violent storm of rain and

¹ Parochiale Anglic., 1733, p. 189.

² Pp. 56, 62, 287.

³ Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 212. He is not to be identified either with Gwryn (or Cynyr, as later corrupted) Farfdrwch of Meirionydd.

⁴ It is called in full in the Book of Llan Dâv, ut supra, Lann Teliau Pimp Seint Kair Kaiau.

⁵ Arch. Camb., 1878, pp. 322-3.

hailstones affixed to the stone. A malignant sorcerer appeared and carried them off to his cavern, where they are destined to remain asleep until the happy day mentioned.¹

The block, supposed to have on it the impression of the five heads on each of its four sides, has been extracted from the mine, and was originally horizontal. The hollows are actually mortars in which the quartz was crushed for gold.

Another legend relates that once upon a time a certain woman named Gweno was induced to explore the recesses of the cavern beyond a frowning rock which had always been the prescribed limit to the progress of the inquisitive. She passed beyond it, and was no more seen. She had been seized by some superhuman power, as a warning to others not to invade those mysterious penetralia; and still on stormy nights, when the moon is full, the spirit of Gweno is seen to hover over the crag like a wreath of mist.

Gweno has given name to Ffynnon Gweno (the actual position of which is now not known), which had formerly a high reputation for healing virtues, and it is hardly out of memory that crutches were suspended above it; and also to Clochdy Gweno, an isolated rock standing up in the midst of the great gold excavations.²

Legend associates also the Five Saints with Llanpumpsaint, formerly a chapelry in the parish of Abergwili, but now a separate parish. They at first, it is said, intended to found their church there on Moelfryn Clynneuadd, where are still some remains, but nothing but ill-luck attended their labours. Ultimately they decided upon the present spot. Their Holy Well, Ffynnon Bumpsaint, is near the church.³ The following, relating to this parish, is extracted from Archdeacon Tennison's Visitation of the Archdeaconry of Carmarthen, July and August, 1710—"There are five wells or pools in the river which tradition says were made use of by the five saints, and that each particular saint had his particular well. On S. Peter's day yearly between two and three hundred people got together, some to wash in, and some to see these Wells. In the summer time the people in the neighbourhood bathe themselves in the wells to cure aches."⁴ A large flat stone, bearing incised crosses and other marks, formerly lying in the churchyard, has been removed into the church, and on it now stands the altar. It was popularly called Carreg y Pumpsaint.

¹ Cambrian Register, iii (1818), pp. 40-1; The English Works of Rev. Eliezer Williams, London, 1840, pp. 155-6.

² Arch. Camb., ut supra.

³ Yr Haul, 1849, pp. 222-4.

⁴ Given in Evans (J. T.), Church Plate of Carmarthenshire, London, 1907, p. 80.

Gwyn ab Nudd is given in one entry in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ as a Welsh saint; but he is a well-known figure in Welsh mythology—the King of Annwn, the Welsh Under-world.

S. GWYNAN, see S. GWYNEN

S. GWYNDAF HËN, Confessor

GWYNDAF HËN (the Aged) was one of the many sons of Emyr Llydaw. No pedigrees but those in the Iolo MSS. appear to include him among the Welsh saints. He is there said to have been “confessor (periglor) to S. Garmon ab Ridicus, and to have come to this Island with the said Garmon in the time of Gwrtheyrn Gwrtheneu.” He married Gwelonwy, the daughter of Meurig ab Tewdrig, King of Morganwg, and sister to Anna, the wife of Amwn Ddu. He was the father of SS. Meugant and Henwyn, the former of whom seems to have remained with him. He was also periglor in Côt Illtyd at Llantwit; and it is added that “he was afterwards made principal of Côt Dyfrig at Caerleon on Usk, and in his old age went to Bardsey where he lies buried.”² No reliance can be placed on some of these statements.

Gwyndaf is the patron of Llanwnda, in Carnarvonshire, and of another church of the name in Pembrokeshire. In the parish of Troedyraur, Cardiganshire, was formerly a chapel known as Capel Gwnda. It stood on the banks of the Ceri, where now is the Rectory. In the bed of the river there is a rock with a flat surface in which are holes, visible in summer, said to have been made by Gwyndaf's knees whilst engaged in prayer when once journeying through the country. From these holes was derived a medicine for wounds and sores, which effected a cure for the people of this parish only, who used to bathe their feet etc. in them. His piety and good deeds becoming known, he was invited to his residence by the great man in the neighbourhood, who gave him the land on which he erected this chapel. Gwyndaf in return bestowed his blessing upon him and the neighbourhood. Near the chapel is a small waterfall, which forms a pool in the river, known as Cerwyn Gwynda (his brewing tub), and on the other side of the river in the parish of Penbryn are two places called Felin Wnda and Capel Gwnda, the latter a farm.

¹ P. 123.

² Iolo MSS., pp. 108, 132–3; cf. p. 112. The element -daf, for old Welsh -tam, occurs in Cyndaf, Maeldaf, etc.

There is a legend current in Llanwnda, Pembrokeshire, that one day whilst returning there from Fishguard, in crossing the brook that divides the two parishes a fish leaped and frightened his horse, so that he was thrown and fractured his leg. He thereupon cursed the brook that never a fish should appear in it; and so it came to pass. There is here a Carn Gwnda.

His festival does not occur in any of the Calendars. Browne Willis, however, gives November 6 for his church in Pembrokeshire, and April 21 (S. Beuno's Day) for that in Carnarvonshire.²

In Additional MS. 31,055,³ in the autograph (1594-6) of Sir Thomas Williams, are a number of "Sayings" attributed to him, called "Geiriau Gwynda Hên." They are of the aphoristic, ethical character of collections well-known in late mediaeval Welsh literature, which, by their sentiments and diction, are rarely older than the MSS. in which they occur.

S. GWYNDEG, Confessor

GWYNDEG was one of the sons of Seithenin, King of Maes Gwyddno, whose land was overflowed by the sea and now lies under Cardigan Bay. They all afterwards became "Saints" in Bangor on Dee. He was the father of Cynyr of Caer Gawch, S. David's grandfather, and of a S. Padrig. He is known to us through one late document only in the *Iolo MSS.*⁴ A certain Gwndec (Gwyndeg) is mentioned among the dozen "seamen" who formed S. Cybi's teulu or "family,"⁵ and who were nearly all saints associated with Anglesey.

S. GWYNELL

IN a list of Welsh parishes circa 1566, and others later,⁶ is given a parish in Monmouthshire as Llanwynell or Llanwnell, which is entered

¹ Y Traethodydd, 1856, p. 378. The legend of Gwyndaf, more particularly the traditions current in the Troedyraur Valley, has been put into verse by Gwynionydd in his Briallen Glan Cevi, 1873, p. 9.

² Parochiale Anglicanum, 1733, pp. 176, 209.

³ They occur at ff. 156^b-157^a, and are followed by "Geiriau Selyf Ddoeth" (Solomon).

⁴ P. 141. ⁵ Their names are given in a short poem, Teulu Cybi Sant.

⁶ Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 919; Myv. Arch., p. 749.

between Llanfihangel Tormynydd and Llangwm. Its exact situation, it would appear, is not now known, but it was probably at, or in the neighbourhood of, Wolves Newton, so called from the Wolff family, which lived there in the fifteenth century.¹ The name suggests a S. Gwynell as the church patron, but the ordinary hagiological sources have no record of even his name. Lewys Dwnn, however, gives the following note—"Syr Vwniel L. off Wolffs Newton Knight. He accepted the Christian Faith año 188, and erected a church at his own expense."² The editor suggests that this was Llanwnell, being, as usual, named after its founder.

S. GWYNEN, Virgin

OF Gwynen, or Gwnen, usually regarded as a female saint, no more is known than that she has given her name to the church of Llanwnen, Cardiganshire. She is invoked, along with Gwenog of the neighbouring parish of Llanwenog, in a copy of the Laws of Hywel Dda in Llanstephan MS. 116, of the second half of the fifteenth century; and also in Dafydd Nanmor's Ode to Henry VII, in a long list of Welsh and other saints, to whose guardianship he commits the King.³ Lewis Glyn Cothi⁴ mentions "Teml Wynen lân," "the Temple of Holy Gwynen."

Llanwnen is now generally believed to be dedicated to S. Lucia, and Willis⁵ and Meyrick,⁶ give the parish feast on December 13, the festival of S. Lucy of Syracuse. In the earliest copy (Cwrtmawr MS. 44) of the Demetian Calendar (S) is entered against this day, "Gwnnen⁷ and Gwnns (=Gwynws), two sons of Brychan," by the former of whom the Llanwnen patron is evidently meant, but here made to be a male and not a female saint. This is the only calendar in which the festival occurs. A fair is held at Llanwnen on December 13, which was also its date O.S., no account, contrary to the usual custom, having been taken of the eleven days difference between the two Styles. On December 13 is also commemorated the illustrious Finnian of Clonard, whose name may be equated with Gwynan,

¹ G. T. Clark, Genealogies of Morgan and Glamorgan, London, 1886, p. 432.

² Heraldic Visitations, ed. Meyrick, Llandoverly, 1846, i, p. 11.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 314. The copy in Cardiff MS. 7 (sixteenth century) reads "Gwnan." Several persons named Guinan, lay and cleric, occur in the Book of Llan Dâu.

⁴ Gwaith L. G. C., Oxf., 1837, p. 208; cf. p. 120.

⁵ Parochiale Anglic., 1733, p. 194.

⁶ Cardiganshire, 1808, p. 46.

⁷ The Great (1806) copy has "Gwynan."

though his namesake of Mowille, as we take him, was culted under the form Ffinan in Anglesey.

Capel Gwynen or Gwynan, near Beddgelert, now extinct, stands for (in full) Capel Nant Gwynain, being so called from the river there of the name.

S. GWYNFYL, see S. GWENFYL

S. GWYNGENEU, Confessor

GWYNGENEU was the son of Paul Hên,¹ sometimes said to be "of the North" and at other times "of Manaw," no doubt the Manaw, a district lying on the Firth of Forth, and not the Isle of Man. He was brother to SS. Peulan and Gwenfaen, who have dedications at Llanbeulan and Rhoscolyn in Anglesey. To Gwyngeneu was dedicated the now extinct Capel Gwyngeneu in the parish of Holyhead.

His festival is not known. His name occurs sometimes as Gwrgeneu and Gwylgeneu. Ceneu, "a whelp or cub," is a somewhat common name-element in Welsh.

S. GWYNHOEDL, Confessor

GWYNHOEDL was one of the sons of Seithenin, King of Maes Gwyddno, whose territory the sea submerged and now lies under Cardigan Bay.² He and his brothers, after this catastrophe, are said to have become "Saints" at Bangor Iscoed. He is the patron of Llangwnadl, Carnarvonshire. The church is sometimes said to be dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and at other times to S. Michael and S. Gwynhoedl.

The name "Vendesetli" occurs on an inscribed stone, of about

¹ Peniarth MS. 75 (sixteenth century); Myv. Arch., pp. 426, 429. His father's name is usually given, but wrongly, as Pawl Hên. At the first reference it is "Pevl Hen o Vanaw." See further under S. GWENFAEN.

² Peniarth MSS. 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16; Cardiff MS. 5 (1527); Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 426, 428; Cambro-British Saints, pp. 267-8; Iolo MSS., p. 141. His name is variously spelt Gwynnoedyl, Gwennoedyl, Gynodyl, Gwynodl, and Gwnadl. He is no doubt the Geneddyl of the Seithenin list on p. 105 of Iolo MSS. Gwnodl is a township of the parish of Llangar, Merionethshire. Hoedl was rather a common name-element among the Brythonic Celts. Gwynhoedl had a brother named Hoedloyw.

the sixth century, found in the neighbouring parish of Llannor. It occurs also as "Vennisetli" on an inscribed stone at Llansaint, Carmarthenshire. Both forms would to-day be represented by this saint's name, and it is highly probable that the Llannor stone commemorates him. An inscription, in Gothic capitals, on the pier supporting the easternmost aisle arch in Llangwnadl Church has been thus read:—

I H S S' GWYNHOYDYL IACET HIC.¹

The name means "him of the blessed or happy life."

His festival does not occur in any of the Calendars, but it is given by Browne Willis as January 1.²

S. GWYNIN, Confessor

THIS saint was a son of Helig ab Glanog.³ Some of the earlier genealogies⁴ have by mistake substituted his grandfather's name for his father's, making him son of Glanog ab Helig Foel of Tyno Helig. They ascribe to him two brothers, Bodo, or Boda, and Brothen. The late Iolo MSS. pedigrees are, as usual, more circumstantial. According to these,⁵ Gwynin was one of "the twelve sons of Helig ab Glanog, of Tyno Helig in the North, whose lands the sea overwhelmed, and they became Saints in Bangor Fawr in Maelor; and, afterwards, some of them went to Côr Cadfan in Bardsey. They lived in the time of Rhun ab Maelgwn," i.e. about the middle of the sixth century. Their territory is now covered in part by the Lavan Sands, on the Carnarvonshire coast.

Gwynin is the patron of two churches in Carnarvonshire—Llandygywynin⁶ or Llandegwning (subject to Llaniestyn), and Dwygyfylchi ("the two converging passes"), which is retained as the name of the parish and of a hamlet, Penmaenmawr being that of the town. His festival does not occur in any of the Welsh Calendars, but it is given ¹ Cathrall, Hist. of North Wales, 1828, ii, p. 122; Arch. Camb., 1848, pp. 147-150. It has been supposed that it terminated with the date 750.

² Bangor, 1721, p. 274; so also Cambrian Register, iii (1818), p. 224.

³ Cardiff MS. 25 (Hanesyn Hên), pp. 30, 35, 118; Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 118; Myv. Arch., pp. 418-9, 426, 429. The termination is also given as -un, -wn, and -yn. The name occurs in Brittany as Guénin.

⁴ E.g., Peniarth MS. 16 (his name as Gwymyn); Hafod MS. 16.

⁵ P. 124; cf. p. 106, where it is stated that he was a saint in Ceredigion.

⁶ This form implies that he was sometimes known as Tygwynin, with the honorific prefix to; cf. Tyfaelog for Maelog, etc. We should, however, have expected the name to appear as Tywynin.

as having been observed on December 31 in the former parish and on January 31 in the latter.¹

In the Penmaenmawr Survey,² written by Sir John Wynn of Gwydir (died 1626), it is stated, "Beda (Boda) and Gwynn (Gwynin) weare both saintes in Dwygyfylchi, and doe lye buried att the end of the Church in a litle Chappell annexed to the west end of the Church." This makes the church to be dedicated to the brothers conjointly. There are no traces now of the chapel.

The Wynnin who has given name to Kilwinning, in Cunningham, with the S. Winning's Well there, and to Caerwinning, at Dalry, was "born in the Scotie province," and his legend is in the Breviary of Aberdeen. His festival is January 21.³

S. GWYNIO, Martyr

OF this saint very little is known; of his parentage nothing. In Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 117, there is the following note, in Welsh—"Gwnio of Llanwnio was killed by the Irish (y Gwythel) whilst going to Cil Sant (the Saint's Retreat), and Ffynnon Gwnio sprang up where his head fell;" that is, he was decapitated there by them. Llanwynio is a parish in Carmarthenshire, the church of which is dedicated to him, and Cil Sant is about a mile and a half south of the church. The situation of his Holy Well does not appear to be known, but there is a Ffynnon Felan between the church and Cil Sant. Lewis Glyn Cothi⁴ mentions "Gwynio Wyn," Blessed Gwynio.

The *Book of Llan Dâv*⁵ enters "Eccluis Gunniau (vel Guiniau) ubi natus est Sanctus Teliaus" among the possessions of the church of Llandaff in the old cantref of Penfro, in Pembrokeshire. This church, Eglwys Wnio or Wynio, is believed to be S. Twinnel's, dedicated to S. Winnocus,⁶ but Dr. Gwenogvryn Evans plausibly suggests⁷ that it was Penally.

His festival at Llanwynio is given by Browne Willis on the same day in two different months, on March 2⁸ and May 2⁹ with, apparently, an error as to the month.

¹ Willis, Bangor, 1721, pp. 273, 275; Carlisle, Topog. Dict., 1811; Cambrian Register, iii (1818), pp. 222, 224. ² Reprint, Llanfairfechan, 1906, pp. 18, 19.

³ Forbes, Kalendars of Scottish Saints, 1872, pp. 463-6.

⁴ Gwaith, Oxf., 1837, p. 412; cf. p. 295. The name Guinniau occurs in Brittany (Revue Celtique), xxix, 1908, p. 300.

⁵ Pp. 124, 255.

⁶ Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, pp. 292, 321.

⁷ Book of Llan Dâv, p. 402.

⁸ Parochiale Anglic., 1733, p. 188.

⁹ Browne Willis MS. 37 (1720), fo. 137, in Bodleian Library. Rice Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 308, gives the two dates.

S. GWYNLLEU, Bishop, Confessor

GWYNLLEU, or Gwynllef, was the son of S. Cyngar ab Garthog ab Ceredig ab Cunedda Wledig.¹ He had a brother S. Cyndeyrn (not Kentigern). Some of the pedigrees, more especially the later ones, give his name as Gwynlliw.

His festival, November 1, occurs only in the Demetian Calendar (S)—as Gwyl Wnllle—and he is entered as Bishop, and patron of Llangwnlle, in Cardiganshire, by which is meant Nantcwnlle.²

S. GWYNLLYW, King, Confessor

THE authorities for the Life of Gwynllyw are :—

1. The Life of S. Cadoc, already described under S. CADOC.

2. The Life of S. Gundleus in MS. Cotton. Vespas. A. xiv. (early thirteenth century), printed by Rees in Cambro-British Saints, pp. 145–157, but collated with the copy in MS. Titus D. xxii (fifteenth century). This is a most unsatisfactory composition, inasmuch as the author deliberately and wantonly altered facts so as to write for edification. It is significant of the method of mediaeval hagiographers to compare the picture of the early life of Gwynllyw, as revealed in the Life of S. Cadoc, with that presented by the panegyrist in the other Life. There is a condensation of it in Capgrave from John of Tynemouth, which has been reprinted in Acta SS. Boll., Mart. iii, p. 78r.

To deal with the second authority. The basis of this would seem to have been a Welsh poem on the Conversion of the King. But most assuredly tampered with, in the facts, by the hagiographer, and we may suspect that the story in the Life of S. Cadoc more nearly represents the theme of the poet. The writer says: “Britannus quidam versificator Britannice versificans, composuit carmina a sua gente, et Britannico sermone laudabilia de conversatione Sanctissimi Gunlyu, et de miraculis conversati que Deus pro illius amore concessit operari, nondum eadem finita erant carmina a compositore; quarta enim pars carminum defuerat in compositione, quesierat autem materiam composituræ, non fuit tamen facultas ingenii ultro invenire. Interea marina undositas vehementissima cum fortissimo rigore, contexit campestria, summersit cunctos habitatores et edificia . . . inceptit quartam partem carminum componere, timens submergi tunc pro timore. Dum in cepisset impleta est fluctibus; post hæc ascendit trabes superius, et secutus est iterum tumens fluctus tercio super tectum, nec cessat ille fungi laudibus. Illis finitis, Britannus poeta evasit.”¹

¹ Peniarth MSS. 16, 27, 45; Hafod MS. 16; Hanesyn Hên, p. 112; Myv. Arch., p. 426; Cambro-British Saints, p. 265; Iolo MSS., pp. 102, 110, 125. Gwynlleu is compounded of Gwyn, and the Lleu of the well-known Mabinogion name, Lleu (Llew) Llawgyffes.

² The instances in which Llan becomes Nant are few; e.g. Nant Nyfer (Nevern)—Llanhyfer. Nant to Llan are more numerous: Nant Carfan—Llan Carfan; Nant Honddu—Llanthony, etc.

Gwynllyw Filwr, or the Warrior, as he is generally called in Welsh, was the son of Glywys ab Tegid ab Cadell.² His pedigree as given in the Life of S. Cadoc³ differs from this. It makes him the son of Gluiguis ab Solor ab Nor ab Ouguein ab Maximianus. His mother is said to have been Grawl (Gwawr in the Progenies Keredic and Jesus College MS. 20), daughter of Ceredig ab Cunedda.⁴ The latter pedigree is the one given him also in Jesus College MS. 20, but it reads Filur for Solor, both, in fact, taking his epithet for his father's name.

Gwynllyw was regulus of Gwynllywg, i.e., Gwynllyw's Land, a district lying between the Usk and Rumney Rivers. It was anciently in Morganwg, but is now in Monmouthshire. It is generally anglicized into Wentloog.⁵

Gwynllyw had several brothers, who natalico more divided their father's kingdom between them—Etelic, who obtained the principality over Edelygion, in Monmouthshire; Paul, who had Penychen, in Glamorgan; Seru, to whom fell Seruguunid, or Senghenydd, in Glamorgan; Gurai, who had Gurinid or Gorwenydd, the present Deaneries of Groneath Upper and Lower, in Glamorgan; Mar was given possession of Margam, Cettil of Kidwelly, and Cornouguill of Carnwyllion, in Carmarthenshire. Again another named Metel had to his share Crucmetil. But one, Pedrog, loving the kingdom of God above the possessions of earth, migrated to Cornwall and embraced the ecclesiastical profession.

The Life of S. Petroc by John of Tynemouth does not confirm this last statement; it makes Petroc son of Clement, a regulus in Cornwall, and chronologically it is most likely that Petroc was nephew and not brother of Gwynllyw.

¹ Cambro-British Saints, p. 151. His name is latinized Gundleus. In one MS. in the Iolo MSS., p. 149, he is called Cynlais. Theophilus Jones, Breconshire, ed. 1898, p. 485, supposed Ystradgynlais Church to be dedicated to him.

² Peniarth MSS. 12, 16, 45, etc.

³ Cambro-British Saints, p. 81.

⁴ Ibid., p. 82.

⁵ The name occurs in a variety of forms, the oldest being the Guinllygiauc of the Annales Cambriæ (Cymmrodor, ix, p. 167), which appears later as Gwynllyawg, to be treated as a sister form of Gwynllywg (Gunliviuc in the Book of Llan Dâu). Gwentllwg (whence Wentloog) and Gwaunllwg are late corrupt forms.

The older genealogies give Gwynllyw three sons, Bugi, Catwg (Cadoc), and Cemmeu (Cynfyw). One late document printed in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ gives the following children, all of whom were saints: Catwg, Cammarch, Hywgi (Bugi), Glywys Cernyw, Cynfyw, Gwyddlew, Cyflewyr, Cannen, and Maches.

Gwynllyw, having rioted as a bachelor, deemed it advisable to settle down to the matrimonial estate. How he got married is differently described by the two writers, his panegyrist and the author of the Life of S. Cadoc.

The former says: "When, by the common advice of the inhabitants, he desired to get married, he sent ambassadors to Brychan, King of Brycheiniog, for he had heard of the gentleness and beauty of his daughter, Gwladys. She being requested as a bride and promised, was given that he might enjoy legal nuptials."

The other version of the transaction is very different. Gwynllyw sent many messengers to the father of the virgin, who was called Brychan, being inflamed with passion at her delightful report, and desiring to marry her respectably. The father of the girl, on reception of the legation, was indignant and filled with fury, and absolutely refused to betroth his daughter to him; he treated the messengers with contumely and sent them home. This they took amiss, and returned and related what had been done to them, to their master. Having heard this, the King, drunk with fury, armed as many as three hundred serfs, so as to carry off the girl by force. They immediately set out and reached the court of the aforesaid regulus, at Talgarth, and found the damsel outside the gate, sitting with her sisters, and passing the time in modest conversation. Her they immediately carried off by force, and returned at full speed.

"When Brychan, her father, learned this, he was touched with grief to the heart, and mourning the loss of his most dear daughter, summoned all his friends and neighbours to recover his child. All his auxiliaries having assembled, with haste he pursues his enemy and his accomplices. Now when Gwynllyw saw them, he ordered the girl to be brought to him, and to ride along with him on the same horse. Hardly deigning to fly, he preceded his soldiers slowly, with the girl behind him, and exhorted his men to fight gallantly. But Brychan and his men, boldly attacking the ungentle King and his followers, slew two hundred of them, and pursued them to the hill which bounded their respective territories, and which in the British tongue is called Boch riw carn, which signifies the cheek of a stony road." This is now Vochriw.

¹ P. 130. See also this work, ii, p. 417.

Now it happened that Arthur and his two knights, Cai and Bedwyr (Bedivere), were at the time seated on the top of the hill and were playing dice. When they saw what was going on, Arthur, who was of an amorous complexion, proposed to knock over Gwynllyw and carry off the girl he had behind him. But his comrades dissuaded him from so gross an act and told him that he had best first inquire who the man was who had the damsel en croupe. When Gwynllyw gave his name, and stated that he was on his own lands, then Arthur and his men went to his assistance, and drove back the soldiers of Brychan.

"Then Gwynllyw went with the aforesaid virgin Gwladys to his palace, that was on that hill, which from his name was afterwards called in British, Allt Wynllyw, or the Hill of Gwynllyw."

In due course of time Gwladys conceived, and there were prospects of her becoming shortly a mother.

Now about this time "some of Gwynllyw's thieves (quidam ex Gundleii latronibus) went, with the purpose of committing a robbery, to a town wherein dwelt a religious Irishman, who was a hermit, and served God devoutly, which thieves the aforesaid Gwynllyw loved, and instigated to robbery (eosque sepius ad latrocinia instigabat)."

This hermit had no other possessions save one cow, the finest in the country, and he and his twelve ministers lived on its milk. This cow the thieves carried off, on the very night upon which Gwladys became a mother.

Next day the hermit, whose name is variously given as Meuthi and Tatheus or Tathan, hastened with his disciples to the caer of Gwynllyw to demand back his cow. The King saw him coming, and resolved on playing a practical joke on him. He ordered his servants to place a cauldron of scalding water on the floor, to cover it with reeds, and throw a cloth over the whole.

As soon as the Irish hermit entered, Gwynllyw courteously waved him to this seat, but the shrewd old man, either suspecting mischief, or seeing some steam escape from under the covering, seated himself so gingerly on the edge as not to fall in and be scalded as the King had purposed. As told by the hagiographer, the reeds became miraculously stiff and sustained him.¹

Gwynllyw was perhaps ashamed of himself, or perhaps saw he might get an advantage out of the hermit if he cultivated his friendship, so he gave him back the cow, and engaged him to baptize the new-born son, and this was done, and the child called Cathmail. Afterwards the boy was given to Tatham, to be educated by him.

¹ Vita S^t Tathe in Cambro-British Saints, p. 260. The story is told differently in the Life of S. Cadoc. In it the practical joke is not mentioned.

The picture drawn by the professional hagiographer of S. Gwynllyw is very different. "He reigned over the seven districts of Glamorgan on account of himself and his brothers; all the inhabitants were obedient to the laws, no one then dared to injure another. If any one committed an injury, he suffered punishment; for bribery he would justly lose his patrimony. Peace being confirmed, there were no contentions in his time, he was a pacific king, and a liberal governor in his court . . . his countrymen gloried in such a lord, they frequently returned bounteously laden on the annual attendances."¹

Side by side with this comes the testimony of the other biographer—

"Gwynllyw was given up to carnal allurements, and frequently instigated his guards to robbery and plunder, and lived altogether contrary to what was just and right, and disgraced his life with crimes."²

The conversion of the King did not take place till he was advanced in years. His son Cathmail (Cadoc) became an important monastic founder, and ruled as prince-abbot at Llancafarn.

The account of the conversion differs in the two Lives. According to that of Gwynllyw, an angel came to him in a dream and read him a long theological discourse. But the Life of S. Cadoc says that this latter, "seeing the wicked acts of his father . . . sent faithful messengers of his disciples to him, to wit, Finnian, Gnavan, and his loved pupil Elli, that they might convert him from the errors of his malice and wickedness." This they did, and Gwladys backed up their exhortation. She said to the old King, "Let us trust to our son, and he will be a father to us in heaven."

Gwynllyw was brought to repentance and surrendered the rule over his principality, and resolved on building a church. In true Celtic fashion he looked out for an omen, and one day, finding a white ox on the high ground where now stands S. Woolo's church, Newport, with one black spot on its forehead,³ he thought that a significant token of where he was to settle. He received the consent of Dubricius, the Bishop, and marked out a cemetery, and in the midst of it built a church of boards and rods (tabulis et virgis).

A little distance from the church was an old caer or camp, and in this Gwynllyw and his wife lived. "They did not wash themselves in the frosty season of winter more seldom than in the heat of summer; they rose from their beds in the middle of the night, and after a bath returned to their coldest apartment, put on their clothes, and visited the church, praying and kneeling before the altars until day. Thus they led an eremitical life, enjoying the fruits of their labour, and taking nothing which belonged to other persons." ¹

¹ Vita S^{ci} Gundlei in Cambro-British Saints, p. 146.

² Vita S^{ci} Cadoci in ibid., pp. 84-5.

³ The ox was called Dutelich, which is explained (p. 148) as meaning "the ox with the black forehead." Thelych occurs as the name of a monk in the Life of S. Brynach (ibid., p. 12). See also the Book of Llan Dâw, p. 420 (index).

The position of the old fort occupied by Gwynllyw can be identified.

We must premise that the church is now known as S. Woolo's, a building of unusual length, and standing on the summit of a lofty hill, called Stow Hill.

In a field within a short distance of the church "there was, not long ago," writes Mr. C. O. S. Morgan,² "a moated mound, on the summit of which was planted a clump of fir-trees. There are several of these mounds about the country. They consist of a circular, conical mound, having a flat table-top, usually about fifty feet in diameter, and surrounded by a deep fosse or moat. The summits are always flat. This mound is now in the grounds of Springfield, laid out by the late Mr. Gething. It is, however, no longer a mound, but is buried up to the top with the spoil brought up by the shafts during the excavation of the tunnel of the Great Western Railway, which runs underneath. Its site, however, is still marked; for, in order to preserve it, as the fir-trees were all cut away, I suggested to Mr. Gething to collect the large masses of rock brought up out of the tunnel, and place them in the form of a cairn on the summit of the mound. This mound used to be sometimes called 'The Grave of S. Woolos'; but that was incorrect, as these mounds were not burial-places, but the dwellings or strongholds of the chieftains or rulers of the district, and in subsequent times were converted into castles by the erection of stone edifices on their summits in lieu of the timber or wattled structures which originally crowned them. This mound I believe to have been the dwelling of Gwynllyw, the prince of this district, where he founded his church in close proximity to it; and I fully believe that that mysterious portion of S. Woolo's Church, generally called S. Mary's, is the church, or rather the site of the templum first erected by our saint, and enlarged and altered at various subsequent periods (but always spared) by adding on the east end, like the church of S. Joseph of Arimathea at Glastonbury, when the great abbey was added on to the east end of it."

But this promenade of the old couple down to the Usk in a state of nudity, and their bathing together, as well as their promixity to one another, did not approve itself to the mind of their son Cadoc, and he insisted on a separation.¹ It was hard on the old people, but Cadoc was a severe rigorist, and he insisted on it. So he fixed on a point on the bank of the River Ebbw, where was a spring of the coldest water, in which his mother might continue her daily ablutions.

¹ "Nocte enim media surgebant de lectulis, et redibant post lavacrum lateribus frigidissimis, inde induti visitabant ecclesias." Cambro-British Saints, p. 149. They seem to have stalked naked down hill to the Usk, and back again.

² Arch. Camb., 1885, pp. 261-3. S. Woolo's is from a colloquial Eglwys Wnllw. The mound was called in Welsh Twyn Gwynllyw.

The precise spot has probably been fixed by Mr. Morgan. He says—“On the banks of the river, just above Ebbw Bridge, is a cliff, on the top of which is a small spot of ground, adjoining Tredegar Park walls, of less than half an acre, on which there is a very old cottage. This small detached spot of ground has always belonged to the church of S. Woolo's, and was part of the glebe land; and when the glebe lands were sold, a few years ago, it was purchased by Lord Tredegar. A short distance off, in the Park, there issued from the bank a remarkably beautiful spring of very cold water, over which a bath-house was erected in 1719, and it was always called ‘The Lady's Well.’” Mr. Morgan conjectures that Lady's Well is a corruption of Gwladys' Well, and that the explanation of this piece of land having belonged from time immemorial to the church of S. Gwynllyw is, that it was the site of the hermitage of the mother of S. Cadoc. There was once probably a chapel on the rock, as the place is still called “The Chapel.”

Recently, moreover, Lord Tredegar has discovered the tumulus in which, it is conjectured, she was buried, hard by the chapel and the well.

At last, worn out with age and austerity, and feeling that the end was near, Gwynllyw sent for Cadoc and Bishop Dubricius, and received at their hands the last rites of the Church. He was buried by Cadoc in his own church, Eglwys Wynllyw, i.e. S. Woolo's.²

There was formerly in the parish of Llanegwad, Carmarthenshire, a Capel Gwynllyw, which is only remembered as a cowhouse. It was situated about half a mile from a place still called Nantergwynllyw, on the banks of the Towy, about a mile above Dryslwyn Castle. Gwynllyw is supposed to have retired here some time or other. This “Chaple of Gwnllow” (or Gwnllew) is mentioned in the inventory of Church goods taken in 1552, as is also another “Chaple of Saynt Gwnlei,” in the parish of Llanelly, in the same county, at Capel Isa, in the hamlet of Westfa.³ The ruins of this chapel also have practically disappeared.

The following occurs among the “Sayings of the Wise” triplets:—⁴

¹ “Noluit ut tanta vicinia esset inter illos, ne carnalis concupiscentia invidi hostis suasionem a castitate inviolanda perverteret animos.” Cambro-British Saints, p. 149.

² Ibid., p. 63. Until about 1836 S. Woolo's was the only church in Newport. The district called Pilgwenlly (Gwynllyw's Creek) is in the parish of Holy Trinity (1864). ³ Carmarthen Charters, 1878, pp. 30, 33. ⁴ Iolo MSS., p. 255.

S. GWYNLLYW.

From Statue at S. Woolo's.

Hast thou heard the saying of Gwynllyw,
The son of Glywys, in mutual upbraiding?
"It avails not to reason with a madman."
(Cymhwyll ag ynyfd nid gwiw.)

In the Calendar (as well as his Life) in the MS. collection of Lives of Welsh Saints in Cotton. Vesp. A. xiv. Gundleus or Gwynllyw is entered on March 29; so also in the Calendars in the Iolo MSS., Peniarth MS. 219 (c. 1615), and Allwydd Paradwys, 1670. Nicolas Roscarrock gives the same day; so does Whytford, as Gundlewse. In the Calendar in Hafod MS. 8 (late sixteenth century) it is March 28.¹ Under the form of Gwenleue he is invoked in [the tenth-century Exeter Litany, published by Canon Warren, and also in the tenth-century Celtic Litany in the Dean and Chapter Library, Salisbury.²

S. Gwynllyw is represented, in a niche, in the tower of S. Woolo's, Newport, as a warrior crowned.

His name has gone through strange mutations. Leland says of the Church of Newport, "The Chirch is S. Guntle, Olave in Englisch."³

It is possible that Poughill near Stratton, in Cornwall, was originally dedicated to him, but is now regarded as having S. Olave as its patron. A good number of the family of Gwynllyw settled in Cornwall. The inscribed stone at Stowford bears the name on it of GVNGLI, which is akin to that of Gundleus. The Brychan family to which he was allied through his wife are in force over the north-east of Cornwall. His son Cadoc had a chapel and Holy Well near Padstow; his brother or nephew, Petroc, was the apostle of the county; his son Glywys is probably the S. Gluvias of the Fal.

S. GWYNO, Confessor

A SAINT of this name is entered in the genealogies in the Iolo MSS.,⁴ where he is stated to have been of the lineage of the mythical Brân Fendigaid, and to be the patron of Llanwyno, or Llanwonno, in Glamorganshire. Elsewhere, in the same work,⁵ we are told that this church is dedicated to S. Gwynog, the son of Gildas, whose name is deliberately cut down to Gwyno to match the church-name.

¹ Browne Willis, Survey of Llandaff, 1719, append., p. 8, gives his day by mistake as March 2.

² Revue Celtique, 1888, p. 88.

³ Itin., iv, fo. 53. See further on S. Gwynllyw being called S. Olave, Johns (W. N.), History of the Church of S. Gwynllyw, Newport, 1891, p. 24.

⁴ Pp. 101, 135.

⁵ Pp. 117, 137.

There was, however, a S. Gwyno, who was one of the Five Saints of Caio (see SS. GWYN, etc.), but probably we have another of the name here. To him is dedicated Llanwonno, which was formerly one of the five capellæ under Llantrisant—"the Church of the Three Saints," of which latter Gwyno is also considered to be patron in conjunction with SS. Illtyd and Tyfodwg. He is likewise the patron of Vaynor, formerly called Maenor Wyno, in Breconshire¹; but he is not the patron of Wonastow, near Monmouth, as is sometimes supposed.² The saint's Holy Well, Ffynnon Wyno, is near Llanwonno Church, and also a farm called Dar (or Daeâr) Wyno.

SS. GWYNO and GWYNORO, see SS. GWYN, etc.

S. GWYNOG, Bishop, Confessor.

GWYNOG, son of Gildas,³ is probably the Guiniauc invoked in the tenth-century Celtic Litany from Rheims published by Mabillon.⁴ There is, however, liability to confusion, owing to there having been several saints bearing the same name. A Winnoc belonged to the family of Judicael, and died in 717, but he left Armorica at an early age,⁵ and lived all his monastic life in Flanders, and it is there rather than in Brittany that he was culted.

Gwynog, son of Gildas and grandson of Caw, must have been born between 487 and 507, if our chronology of the life of Gildas be correct. We may with confidence regard the Genocus of the Latin Life of S. Finian of Clonard, as this Gwynog.

¹ In the British Museum Harley Charter III. B. 29, dated 1481, the parish is called, in error, "parochia Sci. Gwynoci." In another Harley Charter, III. B. 43, of 1387-8, it is mentioned as the parish of Gwinau, i.e. Gwyno. Browne Willis, Paroch. Anglic., 1733, p. 181, gives S. Gwendolina as its patron, with festival on October 18. Theo. Jones, Brecknockshire, ed. 1898, p. 473, again, imagined it was S. Gwenfrewi.

² Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 345. This church is dedicated to S. Winwaloe.

³ Gwynyawc in Peniarth MS. 45 and Myv. Arch., p. 416; Gwynog in Cavdiff MS. 5 (1527); Myv. Arch., pp. 426, 428; and Iolo MSS., pp. 102, 137; Guenan (by mistake) in Hafod MS. 16, and Cambro-British Saints, p. 268. In the Iolo MSS., pp. 117, 137, his name has been purposely cut down to Gwyno. At the last reference but one he is said to have been a "saint" of Llantwit and Llan-carfarn. He is to be distinguished from S. Gwenog and S. Gwyno.

⁴ Revue Celtique, 1888, p. 88; also J. Loth in same, 1890, p. 135.

⁵ He was disciple from childhood of S. Bertin at Sithin. "Winnocum a puero sua disciplina instructum . . . quem ab infantia nutriebat." Acta SS. O. S. B., iii, p. 110.

Finnian came to Britain in 527-9, and settled a controversy that had arisen between Gildas and David. Then he went on to Llancarfan, where, having been affectionately greeted by Gildas and Cadoc, he returned to Ireland with his two British disciples, Buite and Genoc.¹ Whether he had received Gwynog as a pupil before this, or only now, we are not informed. We can well understand Gildas committing his young son to Finnian to be trained by him in Ireland, to be his spiritual foster-father, before he himself departed for Rhuis, doubtless intending that his son should rejoin him, when fully educated and disciplined.

In Ireland, Genoc made a foundation at Kilglin, near Kilcoch, in Meath, and he is commemorated in the Irish Martyrologies on December 26, under the names of Genoc and Mogenoc.

On his way home, Finnian visited S. Coeman at Dairinis, and S. Loeman. He arrived in Ireland when Muiredach mac Aengus was king of the Hy Cinnselach, who is supposed to have died in 525 after a reign of nine years. We must either suppose that this arrival in Ireland refers to a previous crossing thither, which is most probable, or that Gwynog had been confided to Finnian at an earlier period; that is, if the identification be admitted. The reception given to Finnian is described as effusive, as given to a stranger, so that the former conjecture is most likely to be right. How long Gwynog remained with Finnian we do not know; we next find him settled in Wales. His most noteworthy church there was Llanwnog, near Caersws, in Montgomeryshire. The position was one of importance, as Caersws was an old Roman town at the junction of three rivers that combine to form the Severn, in an extensive basin surrounded by mountains. To the north of Caersws stands a dome-shaped height surmounted by a fortress of earthworks, and on the slope of the mountain, commanding the plain and the gorges down which stream the rivers, facing the sun, was the spot chosen by Gwynog for his church.

In or about 540, perhaps as late as 544, appeared the Increpation of Gildas against the princes of Wales. If Cuneglas, against whom Gildas hurled abuse, and whom he called by offensive names, were, as is supposed, the King of Powys, the son of Gildas could not remain in his territory, enjoying his protection.

It is not credible that a prince, against whom Gildas had railed as "a bear, a rider of many, wallowing in the old filth of his wickedness, a tawny butcher," would endure the presence on his lands of the son of the man who had so publicly and grossly insulted him. The sons and brothers of Gildas must have cursed the day when that intemperate epistle was flung at the heads of the princes, and have forced them to quit their pleasant settlements.

¹ "Completo peregrinationis sue anno xxx° cepit iter cum Sancto Biteo et Sancto Genoco, et cum aliis quibusdam religiosis Britonibus, qui propter vite ejus sanctitatem adhererunt ei. . . . Accepta igitur benedictione a sanctis viris Cathmaleo et Gilda pervenit cum suis ad mare. Igitur navigantibus Finnianus et hii qui cum eo erant mare, cum Deo adjutorio pervenerunt ad portum quandam in campo Itha, nomine Dubglais." Acta SS. Hibern. in Cod. Sal., col. 195.

That Gwynog went now to Rhuis is a mere matter of conjecture. That he was for a while at Cadoc's monastery on the Sea of Etel is rendered probable by there being a Church, Plouhinec, dedicated to him, near it. We venture on a suggestion. Gildas had lived on the best possible terms with Weroc, Count of Broweroc. The country round Vannes was occupied by immigrant Britons. He had interfered in the domestic arrangements of the Count, had persuaded him against his better judgment to give his daughter in marriage to Conmore, the regent of Domnonia, and had received the grandson of Weroc, also named Gildas, into his monastery.

Weroc died about 550, leaving five sons, Canao, Macliau, and three others. To divide the county into five equal portions was to give meagre mouthfuls to men with large appetites, and following Celtic precedent, Canao murdered three of his brothers, and sought the life of Macliau, who, however, managed to make his escape to Conmore. About 552 Macliau crept back into the country and secretly stole into Vannes, which was a Franco-Gallic city not in the power of the Counts of Broweroc, had his head tonsured, and offered himself for the throne of bishop, which was then vacant. He was elected and consecrated.

About eight years later, Canao accorded protection to Chramm, the fugitive son of Clothair, who had revolted against his father, and had been defeated. What follows has been already described, but may be repeated here to make clear what we suggest.

Clothair marched into Brittany at the head of a large army, and a battle ensued in which Canao was defeated and slain. No sooner did Macliau know of the death of his brother, than he donned military equipment, recalled his wife and children, whom to satisfy Franco-Roman prejudice he had dismissed, and claimed to be Count of Broweroc. The bishops of the province of Tours excommunicated him, but he disregarded the sentence. Then he entered into a compact with Budic II of Cornugallia, in virtue of which each was to stand by the children of the other in the event of the death of one of them. Budic died in 570, whereupon, with total disregard of his oaths, Macliau drove Tewdrig, son and heir of Budic, from his domains, and annexed them to his own. Tewdrig for some time wandered as a fugitive, but having collected a band of adherents, suddenly came down on Macliau, killed him and one of his sons, Jacob, and reinstated himself as King of Cornugallia. This was in 577. At once, another son of Macliau, named Weroc, assumed the countship, and ruled Bro-weroc for twenty years, engaged nearly the whole time in conflict with the Merovingian kings. The Church of Vannes must have been in a sorry plight, when its bishop had been leading a purely secular life, and was under a sentence of excommunication. When Macliau was dead, it was important that it should have over it a man of integrity, morals and piety, as its chief pastor. Gildas died in the same year that Macliau unfrocked himself. The Church of Vannes chose as his successor one whom Gregory of Tours calls Eunius. Was this Gwynog the son of Gildas? We cannot be sure.¹ Welsh tradition represents Gwynog as a bishop; he is so figured in stained glass in the Church of Llanwnog. None, it might well be supposed by the people of Vannes, could be better calculated to redress the disorders caused by Macliau than a son of Gildas summoned for the purpose from the neighbouring monastery of Rhuys.

We do no more than offer the identification as possible.

After the defeat of Canao for seventeen years (577-594) hostilities were almost incessant.

The Franks had devastated Bro-weroc, and had established themselves in Vannes itself. Macliau had not attempted to expel them, but it was other with Weroc II. He took the town by surprise directly after his father's death.

Next year (578) so as to recover it, Chilperic collected a large force and marched to the river Vilaine, but was attacked in the night, and a rout and slaughter ensued. Weroc II, however, was not in a condition to pursue his success; he came to terms with the Frank King, and promised to pay arrears of tribute, and surrender the city of Vannes. Thereupon Chilperic withdrew. No sooner was he gone, than Weroc made difficulties about fulfilling his engagement, and sent the bishop, Eunius, to Chilperic with a catalogue of grievances and demands. Chilperic was furious at the breach of engagement, and resented it on the unoffending bishop, whom he sent into exile, and hostilities recommenced.

Weroc, on his part, was highly incensed at the treatment his envoy was receiving, and he carried fire and sword into the country of the Franks.²

Gregory of Tours does not speak highly of the character of Eunius. "Nimium vino deditus erat, et plerumque ita deformiter inebriatus, ut gressum facere non valeret." He was taken from Angers, whither ¹ Gregory of Tours does speak of a Winoc, Hist. Franc., v. 24, viii, 34; but he was a mere ascetic, and, not having an ecclesiastical position, would not have his name latinized.

² Greg. Turon., Hist. Franc., v, cc. 27, 41.

he had been relegated, to Paris. Whilst there he was celebrating the Divine Mysteries, one morning, when he broke out into a snort, like the neighing of a horse, and fell down with blood streaming from his mouth and nose. He had, in fact, broken a blood-vessel.¹

Eunius was reconducted to Angers, where he died in 580.

The only church in Wales that we know for certain to be dedicated to Gwynog is Llanwnog (at the foot of Allt Wnog), in Montgomeryshire. The church of the adjoining parish of Aberhafesp is sometimes given (by Browne Willis and others) as dedicated to him, and sometimes to S. Llonio, of the neighbouring parish of Llandinam. At Penstrowed, adjoining Llanwnog, Gwynog's uncle, Gwrhai, has a dedication. The chapels of SS. Gwynog and Noethan, near the Church of Llangwm Dinmael, Denbighshire, have long ago been converted into a mill and a kiln.² A chapel, Llanwynog, under Clodock, in Herefordshire, is now extinct, as is also the little chantry chapel, Capel Gwynog, in the parish of Caerleon, mentioned in the Chantry Certificates, 1548, and Bishop Kitchin's Return, 1563. There was formerly a Capel Gwynog in the parish of Llanfachraith, Merionethshire. According to tradition, Gwynog paid a visit there to S. Machraith, and caused a crystal spring to burst forth near the church, whose water was efficacious in various ailments. A small chapel was afterwards erected over it, and the well is still called Ffynnon y Capel.³ The church of S. Twinnels, Pembrokeshire, which appears, for instance, in the Taxatio of 1291 as Ecclesia S. Wynnoci, cannot be regarded as a dedication to him.⁴

In Wales Gwynog is generally found coupled with his brother, Noethan or Nwython.

The Welsh Calendars do not agree upon the day for his commemoration. The festival of SS. Gwynog and Noethan occurs on October 22, in the Calendars in Peniarth MSS. 27 (part i.), 186, 187, 219, Mostyn MS. 88, Llanstephan MS. 117, Jesus College MS. 6, Additional MS. 14,882, and the Welsh Prymer of 1546; on the 23rd, in the Calendars in the Iolo MSS. and the Prymers of 1618 and 1633; and on the 24th

¹ Greg. Turon., Hist. Franc., v, c. 41.

² Myv. Arch., p. 428. The mill still exists. Edward Lhuyd (Peniarth MS. 251, p. 96) mentions it as Melin y Capel, and also says that "Fynnon wnnod", i.e. S. Gwynog's Well, was situated a quarter of a mile from the church.

³ Taliesin, Ruthin, 1859, p. 136.

⁴ In Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, p. 503, is mentioned Coedywinoke, i.e. Coed Wynog, in Nevern parish. Bottwnog ("Botwynnok" in the Record of Caernarvon, pp. 30, 257), dedicated to S. Beuno, does not appear to have been called after S. Gwynog. Guinoc occurs as a lay witness in the Book of Llan Dâu, p. 143. "Dôl Wnnog" (now Tylwnog) is the seventeenth-century spelling of the name of a tenement in the parish of Cefn, S. Asaph.

S. GWYNOG.

From stained glass at Llanwnnog.

in the calendar in Peniarth MS. 172. There is very little doubt, however, that the correct day is the 22nd.¹

In a window in Llanwnog Church, Gwynog is represented, in stained glass of the fifteenth century, as a bishop. The inscription underneath, "Sancte Guinoce [ora pro nobis]," is imperfect.²

In an Ode to Henry VII, Dafydd Nanmor commits the King to the guardianship of upwards of a hundred saints by name, among whom he gives Gwynog.³

A S. Guinochus, Bishop and Confessor, commemorated on April 13, is known to the Scotch, being honoured in Buchan, but he is assigned to the ninth century, and sometimes to the thirteenth.⁴

S. GWYNWS, Confessor

IN the Demetian Calendar (S), of which the earliest copy is of the sixteenth century, are entered two brothers, Gwynen and Gwynws,⁵ who are said to have been sons of Brychan; but the name of either does not occur in any one of the numerous lists of Brychan's children. They are commemorated on December 13.

Of Gwynws but next to nothing is known. It is quite possible that he was the Guinnus mentioned in the *Vita S. Paterni*⁶ as one of the four persons (duces) whom that Saint set over the "monasteries and churches" that he had founded in Ceredigion.

Gwynws is esteemed the patron of Gwnws, sometimes called Llanwnws in Cardiganshire. On the chalice (1574) the name is spelt "Llanonose." Edward Lhuyd says Ffynnon Wnws was famous for curing eyes. There is a farm called Penlan Wnws in the parish of Nantcwnlle.

¹ Browne Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 277, gives the 26th, and he is followed by Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 258, and others.

² Gwallter Mechain in The Cambrian Quarterly, i (1829), pp. 30-1, gives as the inscription, "Sanctus Gwinocus, cujus animæ propitiatur Deus. Amen." This is absurd. Moreover, the "Sancte Guinoce" still extant show that it was an invocation of the saint. The glass was removed about 1860 from the east window to a small one on the rood-loft stair in the north wall.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 314.

⁴ Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 1872, p. 358.

⁵ The name is generally spelt now Gwnws or Gwnws.

⁶ Cambro-British Saints, p. 191.

S. GWYRFARN

REES¹ enters Gwyrfarn, with Festival on Trinity Sunday, in his list of Welsh Saints who lived between 664 and 700, "including those of uncertain date." We may confidently say that a saint of this name never lived; he owes his fictitious existence entirely to a misreading. Rees evidently came upon him in the Cambrian Register (1818) copy² of the Demetian Calendar (S) first published in the Great (1806). The entry therein runs, translated, "S. Gwryfarn (or Gwyrfarn) on Trinity Sunday, with a great festival on the Saturday evening before, when it is customary to bathe against the tertian ague." In the copies in the Gwyliedydd (1825) and the Archæologia Cambrensis (1854), it is read, "Gwyl y Gwryfon," meaning the Feast of the Eleven Thousand Virgins (Oct. 21). The Great copy reads, "Gwyl y gwr a vu varw," and the earliest copy of all, that in Cwrtmawr MS. 44, of the second half of the sixteenth century, "Gwyl y gwr yfarw," whatever may be the actual allusion.

S. GWYTHELIN, Bishop, Confessor

IN the *Iolo MSS.*³ occurs the following entry: "Gwythelin (saint and bishop) ab Teithfalch ab Nynniaw, of the lineage of Brân Fendigaid. It is not known where he was bishop."

In all probability the same person is meant by the Cyhylyn of the next entry. See under S. CYHYLYN.⁴

A Guethelinus (Kuelyn) is mentioned by Geoffrey of Monmouth as metropolitan of London. He was sent to Armorica for help against the Saxons, and was the instructor of Aurelius Ambrosius and Uther.⁵

S. GWYTHERIN, Confessor

THIS saint, of whose parentage nothing is known, is the patron of the church of Llanvetherin (pronounced Llanverin), in Monmouthshire,

¹ Essay on the Welsh Saints, p. 308.

² iii, p. 221.

³ P. 137.

⁴ ii, p. 217.

⁵ vi, cc. 2-6. He has also (iii, c. 13) a Guithelinus (Kuelyn), King of the Britons. Nennius (§ 49) gives Guitolin as the name of Vortigern's grandfather, and mentions (§ 66) a Guitolinus as having quarrelled with Ambrosius. The name is the Welsh form of the Latin Vitalinus. One of the Welsh names of Warwick is Caer Wythelin.

now dedicated to S. James the Apostle. Rees¹ wrongly gives S. Merin as its patron. A grant of the church, under the name Ecclesia Gueithirin, was made to the Church of Llandaff, in the time of Bishop Nud. The document is printed in the Book of Llan Dâu,² and in the fourteenth century appendices to that work the name occurs as Lanwytheryn.³ The sepulchral effigy of a priest, now in the churchyard, but formerly in the chancel of this church, bears the inscriptions, "S. Vetterinus," and "Iacob P'sona."⁴ The personal name involved is the same as that of the parish-name Gwytherin, in Denbighshire, and is a derivative from the Latin Victorinus.

The S. Gwytherin ab Dingad, made to be brother of SS. Lleuddad, Baglan, and others, owes his existence to a misreading, and only occurs in quite late documents.⁵ The entry out of which he has been evolved runs thus in the earlier genealogies, "Eleri ym pennant gwytherin yn rywynnyawc,"⁶ that is, "Eleri in Pennant Gwytherin in Rhufoniog." The name has now been cut down to Gwytherin. The saint meant is the Elerius of the Life of S. Winefred, and there can be no doubt as to the church having been originally dedicated to him. To-day, it is, like Llanvetherin, dedicated to S. James the Apostle. Edward Lhuyd mentions "Llech Gwrtheryn" as the boundary between the parishes of Ysbytty Ifan and Penmachno.⁷

S. GWYTHIAN, Confessor

THE parish church of S. Gwythian, or Gwithian, on the north coast of Cornwall, is dedicated to this Saint, and S. Gothian's chapel remains in the sands a ruin—probably as ancient as that of S. Piran at Peranzabuloe.

S. Gwythian is a daughter church to Phillack, and therefore a later foundation. The royal manor and seat of the prince was at Connerton, in the parish, and it remained a royal manor continuously. Leland calls it Nicanor or Cenor. The creek of the Hayle estuary running inland here was called Connordore, or Connor's Water.

¹ Welsh Saints, pp. 236, 343.

² P. 228.

³ Pp. 320, 327. In the Taxatio of 1291 the spelling is Lanwetheryn.

⁴ Arch. Camb., 1847, pp. 248-250; 1876, pp. 338-9.

⁵ Iolo MSS., pp. 113, 139; Myv. Arch., p. 426, etc.

⁶ Peniarth MSS. 12 and 16; Hafod MS. 16, etc.

⁷ One of the forms of the oldest recorded Welsh name of Glastonbury, given by William of Malmesbury, is Ynes-witherim, which might well be -witherin.

S. Gwythian can hardly have been one of the Irish party. A Gwythian was Count in the East of Cornwall, when S. Samson arrived there, and found the people in Trigg performing idolatrous rites about a menhir.

A boy tearing about the field on a horse was thrown and taken up insensible. Samson took the lad in his arms and was successful in restoring him; and the people supposed that a miracle had been wrought. That the story is not a fabrication of the writer we conclude. Had it been so, he would assuredly have made the boy son of the Count.

The name of Gwythian is variously given as Guidianus (Vita 1^{ma}), Widianus (Vita 2^{da}), and Gedianus (Vita 3^{ia}).

It is noticeable that we have Lawhitton, Lan-Gwidian, in the neighbourhood, though not indeed in the same deanery. The Cornish names of parishes on the Tamar, where brought in contact with English, have been as much altered as have the Welsh names in that part of Pembrokeshire which is called "Little England beyond Wales." Thus, as in Pembrokeshire, Llan Aidan has been altered into Llawhaden, and Llan Dyfai into Lamphay, so has Lan Gwidian become Lawhitton, Lan Sant has become Lezant, and Lan Winoc has been converted into Lewannick. Landrake has in vulgar parlance become Larrick.

In Domesday Lawhitton appears as Languitfetone. We cannot be at all sure that this is a Llan founded by Gwidian or Gwythian, but it is probable.

Then we find a Langwithian in S. Winnow parish, near S. Samson's foundation at Golant, and this leads to the supposition that for a while he followed this great Saint.

He seems after a while to have entered the congregation of S. Winwaloe.

That he was no obscure Saint appears from his inclusion in the Litany of S. Vougai, as also in that published by Mabillon. In the former his name immediately precedes that of S. Winnow. The form assumed by his name in the former is Guidiane, in the latter Guoidiane.¹ His name occurs in the Life of S. Gurthiern in the Cartulary of Quimperlé.

If he followed Winwaloe into Cornwall, then we can understand how that he should found his chapel of S. Gothian not far from the Winwaloe settlement at Towednack, and it may have been he who gave up to his master the land where are the Winwaloe churches in East Cornwall in a cluster, all in the Trigg district and near Tregear, which perhaps may be the Tricorium where he had his dwelling.

¹ Revue Celtique, 1890, p. 137.

Handwritten notes: 2. S. Gwythian. Trigg p. 2. Lanveteron. Lan Gide. Samwindec.

Handwritten notes: 107/108

S. Gwithian is called the chapel of S. Gothian in Bishop Lacy's Register, September 28, 1433. The S. Gwithian feast is on November 1.

The relics of S. Gwithian (Guedian), together with those of S. Gurthiern, S. Paulennan, and some others, were "invented" in the Isle of Groix, by Benedict, Abbot of Quimperlé (1066, Bishop of Nantes, 1081).¹ They were supposed to have been concealed there from fear of the Northmen in 843-878.

S. GWYTHYR

GWYTHYR occurs in one entry in the *Iolo MSS.*² as a son of Maxen Wledig, who is included among the Welsh Saints; but there is no authority for so regarding him. Eglwys Wythwr (or Wythyr) is the Welsh name for Monington, in Pembrokeshire, but it is said to mean "The Church of the Eight Men," from the number of freeholders which tradition assigns to the parish at one time. The church is dedicated to S. Nicholas.

The Emperor Maximus had a son named Victor, on whom he conferred the title of Augustus. Maximus was defeated and beheaded at Aquileia in 388, and Victor was put to death shortly after. Gwythur or Gwythyr is the form which Victor would assume in Welsh.

S. GYNAID, Hermit

At the end of Buchedd Llewddog Sant in Llanstephan MS. 34 (sixteenth century) we are told that, after two monks from the South, there came to Bardsey, "Malysgedd, Gynaid, Luwsianus, and Ciprianus, pilgrims, who wrought miracles. The said Gynaid lived in a cave, his sustenance being drops of water to drink,³ and he still heals the sick. It is on this account that the island was first called the Island of the Saints."

¹ Cartulaire de Quimperlé, ed. L. Maitre et P. de Berthon, Paris, 1896, p. 7.

² P. 138. The name occurs in Brittany as Withur.

³ This seems to be the meaning of the Welsh, "ai ymborth ef oedd ddeigr o ddyfwr yw yfed." In the cywydd to the "Twenty Thousand Saints" by Hywel ab Dafydd (fifteenth century) Bardsey is called "tir gwnaid" (al. gnaid), which may possibly comprise the hermit's name.

Calcutta

Tregynon

near Llanost

S. HAWYSTL, Virgin

HAWYSTL is said to have been a daughter of Brychan, but she occurs only in the later lists of his children.¹ The name in the Cognatio de Brychan that approaches it nearest in form is Tudhistil, of which, if we are to regard her as a daughter of Brychan, it must be a corruption. It appears in the later lists also as Tangwystl and Tanglwst.

In Peniarth MS. 178 (sixteenth century) we are told that "Hawystl is a saint (female) in Caer Hawystl,"² but in the *Iolo MSS.*³ the statement is expanded, "her church is at Llan Hawystl in Caer Loyw" (Gloucester). The latter has been supposed to be Aust, under Henbury, near Bristol. Llan Awstl, in Machen, Monmouthshire, has also been suggested.⁴

Hawystyl or Awystyl Gloff is given in the early genealogies as the father of Deifer of Bodfari, Teyrnog of Llandyrnog, etc.; and Hawystyl Drahwac (the Arrogant) occurs in the Triads also as the name of a man.

S. HEILIN, Confessor

IN the list of the children of Brychan in the sixteenth century Peniarth MS. 75,⁵ p. 21, is given as a son, "Heilin, in Dyffryn Aled." The Aled is a river in northern Denbighshire, a tributary of the Elwy, which runs past the village of Llansannan; but there does not appear to have ever been a dedication to Heilin anywhere within its valley. There was, however, a chapel dedicated to a saint of this name at one time in the township of Trefollwyn, in the parish of Llangefni, Anglesey. Henry Rowlands (d. 1723), the historian of Anglesey, wrote of it in his *Antiquitates Parochiales*⁶—"It (the township) had formerly a chapel dedicated to a certain S. Heilin, which now, through the injury of time and the coldness of ancient piety, has fallen into ruins." Lewis Morris⁷ (d. 1765) also mentions "Cappel Heily (al. Heilin)," and its churchyard, as in Llangefni.

¹ E.g., Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 140; Myv. Arch., p. 419.

² So also Myv. Arch., p. 426. ³ P. 120.

⁴ Cambro-British Saints, p. 607.

⁵ This seems to be the only Brychan list in which the name occurs. Heilin or Heilyn is not a rare name. At an early period there was a Heilin, son of Gwyddno, and a Heilin, son of Llywarch Hên (Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, pp. 56, 266; cf. p. 155).

⁶ Arch. Camb., 1849, p. 265.

⁷ Ibid., 1896, p. 140.

William of Worcester gives Helye as one of the children of Brychan who migrated to Cornwall, and founded a church there. He gives this saint as the twentieth child, and again as twenty-third Adwen Helye. Evidently Heilin is intended. Leland, in his list, gives Adwen as twenty-second and Helic as twenty-third, but he gives Delic as the fifth, which is the Delyan of William of Worcester.

Delyan is probably Endelion, and Helye seems to have been supposed to have founded Egloshayle, but the name signifies no more than the church on the salt marshes.

Nicolas Roscarrock gives him as Helim.¹

S. HELAN, Priest, Confessor

ACCORDING to Leland, there was a Helena of the company of S. Briaca. He probably meant Helen or Helan, the brother of Germoe or German, who was one of her companions as well. The party of seven brothers with their three sisters, after having left some traces in Cornwall, crossed to Armorica, and landed probably in the estuary of the Rance, from which they proceeded up the river, founding churches on their way; and finally reached Rheims in the time of S. Remigius (see under SS. ACHEBRAN and GERMAN MACGUILL).

By the Rance S. Helan founded Lanhelen and S. Helen, the former in Ille-et-Vilaine, the latter in Côtes du Nord, but they are adjoining villages.

In the east window of S. Helen the saint is represented habited as a bishop in fifteenth century glass, giving his benediction to a field of spring corn.

Very little is known of the saint's life, beyond the mention by Flodoard. But his office from the Rheims Breviary is given by the Bollandists in the Acta SS. for October 7, iii, pp. 903-5.

The brothers must have remained some time on the Rance and in its neighbourhood, as there are several churches there that bear their names.

S. Ailbe, returning to Ireland through Gaul, encountered them, and, as his Acts relate, settled them in a monastery there. The legend is this. Arriving in this region he found the river dried up, and, pitying the people, he struck a rock with his staff four times, whereupon four streams gushed forth from it which, flowing in different directions, watered the whole province,² "In illa autem regione magnum edificavit monasterium, in quo reliquit filios Guill." If the map be looked at in vol. i, p. 106, it will be seen that four or even five rivers rise from the same elevated ground near S. Aubin du Cormier, in Ille-et-Vilaine; these are the Illet, the Chevré, the Veuvre, and the Ille. The Couesnon rises more to the east. The monastery founded by S. Ailbe must have been situated in this district.

¹ See i, pp. 313, 318-20.

² Acta SS. Hibern. in Cod. Sal., col. 244.

After having tarried some time in the district, the seven brothers and their sisters moved on to Rheims, where they were well received by S. Remigius, and Helan settled at Bucciolus, near Biscuil, surrounded by pleasant meadows, near the Marne.

Here he lived for many years instructing the people in the Faith, and here he is supposed to have died and been buried. He is commemorated on October 7 in the Martyrology of SS. Timothy and Apollinaris, Rheims, and in that of Molanus; and he has been introduced into the modern Roman Martyrology. In the Irish Martyrologies of Tallaght, Donegal, and O'Gorman he is entered, as a priest, on October 8, and Chellan or Ceallan was doubtless the Irish form of his name.

In the Martyrology published by Molanus: "In pago Remensi, vico, qui vocatur Busciolus, depositio Sancti Helani, presbyteri et confessoris."

A S. Helen, Bishop of that see, is imagined, but his name occurs in no authentic list of the bishops.

There are several chapels in West Cornwall dedicated to S. Helen, one at S. Just in Penwith, and one in Burian. One also in Landewednack, and another in Ruan Major. One also is mentioned in Bishop Stafford's Register, at Ingleby, in Crantock parish.

S. Helen, of Scilly, is a modern corruption of S. Illid; and we cannot be sure that some confusion may not have arisen respecting the others.

S. HELEDD, Virgin.

IN Monmouthshire there is a church called Llanhilleth, dedicated to S. Illtyd. In parish lists of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the name is spelt Llan-hyledd, -hiledd, with, in one MS., vorwyn, "virgin," added.¹ The Llan Helet of the *Englynion y Beddau*² would appear to be the same name. Heledd is rare as a personal name,¹ and we are probably right in assuming that Hiledd is a variant form.

¹ Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 920; Myv. Arch., p. 749. Coxe, Monmouthshire, 1801, p. 253, imagined the church to be dedicated to a S. Ithel. Yr Heledd Wen and Yr Heledd Ddu are respectively the Welsh names of Nantwich and Northwich in Cheshire. "Gyru halen i'r Heledd," to send salt to the Wiches, is a proverbial saying. Heledd means a brine or salt pit.

² Black Book of Carmarthen, ed. Evans, p. 64; Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, p. 29.

The Welsh saintly genealogies know nothing of a saint of this name, but Cyndrwyn, the grandfather of SS. Aelhaiarn, Cynhaiarn and Llwhaiarn, had a daughter so called. Cyndrwyn lived towards the close of the fifth century, and was prince of that part of ancient Powys which included the Vale of the Severn about Shrewsbury. He is said to have been of Llystinwynnan, in Caereinion, now represented by Llysyn, in Llanerfyl, Montgomeryshire. He was the father of the celebrated Cynddylan and seven other sons, most of whom, if not all, were killed in the wars with the Saxons. He had also nine daughters. Their names are recorded in the elegy by Llywarch Hên on the death of Cynddylan, Heledd being twice mentioned by name.²

Among the "Sayings of the Wise" triplets occurs the following³ :—

Hast thou heard the saying of Heledd,
The daughter of Cyndrwyn, of extensive wealth?
"Prosperity cannot come of pride"
(Ni ellir llwydd o falchedd).

The "saying" differs in the "Stanzas of the Hearing"⁴ :—

"It is not conferring a benefit that causes poverty" (Nid rhoddi da a wna dlodedd).

Whether Llanhilleth takes its name from her it would be difficult to say.

S. HELEN or ELEN, Queen, Widow

MUCH difficulty exists relative to this Saint, on account of her having been confounded with Helena, mother of Constantine the Great. The latter was erroneously supposed to have been a daughter of Coel, a British king, whereas, actually, she was a native of Drepanum, in Asia Minor, and is said to have been there a stabularia, or female ostler, whom Constantius Chlorus took as his concubine or wife—it is not easy to say which.

¹ In one of the Triads (e.g., in Mabinogion, p. 306) Heledd is given as a man's name apparently, despite the footnote in Myv. Arch., p. 392.

² Skene, ut supra, ii, p. 288.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 254.

⁴ Myv. Arch., p. 128.

Helen, or as in Welsh, Elen, the British Princess, was the daughter of Eudaf ab Caradog,¹ and is generally known in Welsh tradition as Elen Luyddog,² or Elen of the Hosts. Geoffrey of Monmouth in his Historia has two Elens, which have been confounded. One he makes to be daughter of Coel, who in the Latin text is called "Coel dux Kaercolvin, id est Colecestræ" (v, c. 6), but in the Welsh text, "Koel jarll Kaer Loyw," or Earl of Gloucester, and the same text adds of Elen, "a honno uu Elen Luydawc,"³ identifying her with the daughter of Eudaf, words, however, which have nothing equivalent to them in the Latin. This Elen he also makes mother of Constantine—and the Welsh legend attributing the Invention of the Cross to Elen Luyddog is complete. But it should be mentioned that "Helen Luicdauc" is given as the mother of Constantine, and credited with the Invention, in the Old Welsh pedigrees in Harleian MS. 3859, a MS. of circa 1100, but containing pedigrees which were collected, it is believed, in the tenth century. He gives the other Helen's father, in the Latin, as "Octavius dux Wisseorum," and, in the Welsh, as "Eudaf jarll Ergig ac Euas," names which it would not be possible to equate; and he locates her father, not at Carnarvon, but in Herefordshire, or (so San Marte) in Essex. By the former Elen is meant S. Helena, and by the latter Elen of Carnarvon. The epithet "Lluyddog" has become applied to both; properly it can belong to the latter only.

No doubt the genuine Welsh tradition about Elen Luyddog is that contained in the Welsh saga, The Dream of Maxen the Gwledig.⁴ There Eudaf and Elen are associated with Caer Aber Sain, i.e., Segontium, the old Roman town of Carnarvon. She had been seen in a dream, as a maiden of transcendent beauty, by the Roman Emperor Clemens Maximus, called in Welsh Maxen Wledig, and he comes hither with his army to make her Empress of Rome. He remained in the island so long that the Romans made an emperor in his stead. He and Elen, and her two brothers Cynan and Adeon, set out for Rome and take it by storm. Maxen, being re-instated, allowed his brothers-in-law and their hosts to settle wherever they chose. Adeon returned to Britain, while Cynan reduced Brittany and settled there. Geoffrey makes Cynan, whom he calls Cynan Meiriadog, to be Elen's cousin.

¹ Peniarth MSS. 12 and 45; Hafod MS. 16, etc. The classical Helena is called in the Welsh translation of Dares Phrygius Elen Fanog, Elen with the Love-spot.

² The epithet Lluyddog is applied also to Lleuddun, Llyr, and Yrp, more especially in the Triads. ³ Bruts, ed. Rhys and Evans, pp. 107-8.

⁴ Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, pp. 82-92. For the mythical treatment of the story see Rhys, Hibbert Lectures, pp. 161-7, where other Elens are also mentioned.

Clemens Maximus was raised to the purple by the legions in Britain in 383. He was a Spaniard, and had acquired great reputation under Theodosius, in the war against the Picts and Scots (368). He was a humane and good ruler, who showed favour to the native Britons. Unfortunately for himself and for Britain, Maximus did not content himself with establishing himself as King in Britain, but aspired to be Emperor of Rome. He assembled a large army of Britons, prepared a fleet, and crossed the channel. His wife's brother Cynan threw in his lot with him, and led to his assistance the flower of the native youth.

On reaching Gallic soil, Maximus was joined by the troops there placed, and he proceeded to attack the feeble Emperor Gratian, then in Paris. Gratian fled with three hundred cavalry, with intent to join his brother, Theodosius the Younger, in Italy. On his way, he found the gates of every city closed against him, till he reached Lyons, where he was treacherously detained by the governor, till the arrival of Andragathius, general of the cavalry of Maximus, when he was assassinated. His death was followed by that of Melobaudes, King of the Franks, but these were the sole victims, and Maximus was able to boast that his hands were unstained by Roman blood, except that which had been shed in battle.

Theodosius now agreed to resign to Maximus the possession of the countries beyond the Alps; nevertheless in his heart he was resolved on revenge.

Gildas pours a flood of abuse over Maximus. He says:—"The island retained the Roman name, but not the morals and law; nay, rather, casting forth a shoot of its own planting, it sends out Maximus to the two Gauls, accompanied by a great crowd of followers, with an emperor's ensigns in addition, which he never worthily bore nor legitimately, but as one elected after the manner of a tyrant and amid a turbulent soldiery. This man, through cunning art rather than by valour, first attaches to his guilty rule certain neighbouring countries or provinces against the Roman power, by nets of perjury and falsehood. He then extends one wing to Spain, the other to Italy, fixing the throne of his iniquitous empire at Trèves, and raged with such madness against his lords that he drove two legitimate emperors, the one from Rome, the other from a most pious life. Though fortified by hazardous deeds of so dangerous a character, it was not long ere he lost his accursed head at Aquileia: he who had, in a way, cut off the crowned heads of the empire of the whole world."¹ Gildas says nothing of Helen anywhere.

¹ Gildas, ed. Hugh Williams, p. 31.

Maximus had established himself at Trèves as the capital of his portion of the Empire, and doubtless Helen was there with him. The tradition at Trèves is that the present Cathedral was the palace of the Empress Helena, which she gave up to the Church. To this day it bears evidence of having been adapted from a domestic purpose to sacred usages. The atrium, open to the sky, was only domed over comparatively late in Mediæval times. At Trèves, however, Helen the British Princess, wife of Maximus, has been confounded with Helena the mother of Constantine; and there is no historical evidence for asserting that the more famous Helena was ever there, and this misconception has been made to serve as a basis for the origin of the "Holy Coat," shown as a relic in the Cathedral.

Maximus soon became dissatisfied with the government of half the Empire of the West, and resolved on the conquest of Italy. He accordingly collected an army, and marched into Italy. He entered Milan in triumph, but was defeated, and lost his life at Aquileia, in 388. His followers were dispersed and Cynan and his Britons never again saw their native land. "Britain," says Gildas, "is robbed of all her armed soldiery, of her military supplies, of her rulers, cruel though they were, and of her vigorous youth, who followed the footsteps of the above-mentioned tyrant, and never returned." But he says nothing of the populating of Brittany by Maximus's soldiers.

To Welsh tradition Helen is much better known as the great road-maker than as a saint. The latter rôle she has probably entirely derived from her namesake. In Maxen's Dream it is said, "Elen bethought her to make high-roads from one town to another throughout the Island of Britain. And the roads were made. And for this cause are they called the roads of Elen Luyddog." ² Roman roads and old mountain tracks are still most commonly called in Wales Sarn Elen (often Helen), Ffordd Elen, and Llwybr Elen, meaning respectively Elen's Causeway, Road, and Path. For instance, Sarn Elen, running through the site of Beddau Gwyr Ardudwy, near Festiniog, and another south of Dolwyddelan, and the old road or track, Llwybr Elen, or fuller, Llwybr Cam Elen, between Llandderfel and Llangynog. The site of Caer Elen, near Llanfihangel yn Nhowyn, Anglesey, is on the old Roman road to Holyhead. watny 12?

The spignel or baldmoney (meum) is called in Welsh Ffenigl Elen Luyddog (her fennel), or Amranwen Elen Luyddog (her whitewort).

In the Triads she is simply "Mistress of the Hosts" (Lluyddog). One of the three expeditions, called "The Three Silver Hosts," that left these shores and never returned, was that which went with Elen Luyddog and her brother Cynan.¹

¹ Gildas, ed. H. Williams, p. 33.

² Mabinogion, p. 89.

Local tradition says that she once led an army along Ffordd Elen to Snowdon, and whilst passing through Cwm Croesor her youngest son (who is not named) was killed with an arrow by the giant Cidwm. There is a Ffynnon Elen there.

Elen was the mother by Maxen of Owain Finddu, Ednyfed, Peblig (of Llanbeblig, Carnarvon), Cystenin and Gwythyr, all of whom are in the later genealogies entered as saints.² Other sons of Maxen were Anhun (Antonius) and Dimet.

There are but few churches in Wales dedicated to S. Helen or Elen, and it is doubtful whether they are dedicated to Elen Luyddog or to the mother of Constantine. There is a Llanelen in Monmouthshire (called "Eccl. de Sancta Elena" in the Norwich Taxatio, 1254), and a now extinct Llanelen in the parish of Llanrhidian, in West Gower. Bletherston, in Pembrokeshire, now dedicated to S. Mary, is called in Welsh Tref Elen, and there is an Elen's Well in Llawhaden parish (of which Bletherston is a chapelry), which makes it probable that the church originally bore this dedication. Eglwys Ilan, in Glamorgan-shire, and Tref Ilan, in Cardiganshire, are sometimes doubtfully ascribed to her. There is a Ffynnon S. Elen, near Yr Hên Waliau, at Carnarvon, and by it were formerly to be seen the remains of a small chapel.³ Coed Helen, near the same town, is a modern corruption of the old name Coed Alun. A villa named "Lanelen," with land held of "Sca Elena," is mentioned in the *Record of Caernarvon*⁴ as in the commote of Twrcelyn, Anglesey.

In Cornwall and Devon there are the following Helen dedications:—The Parish Church of Helland (Lan Helen). The Parish Church of Paracombe (N. Devon). The Parish Church of Abbotsham (N. Devon). A Chapel at Davidstowe, licensed by Bishop Lacy, August 30, 1443. A Chapel on Lundy Isle. The chapels in the Land's End and Lizard districts bearing her name were probably named after Bishop Helen or Helan and not after Helena.

In the Tavistock Calendar, "Sancta Elena, regina," was commemorated on August 25.

The Empress Helena, mother of Constantine, was not introduced into Calendars till comparatively modern times, on August 18. Her

¹ E.g., Peniarth MS. 45 (Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, p. 462).

² Iolo MSS., pp. 113, 138.

³ John Ray, among others, mentions it in his Itinerary of 1662, Select Remains, London, 1760, p. 228.

⁴ London, 1838, p. 67.

←
? - lorn
N 13

Handwritten Tref Elen of Elen valley Magade

Time celyn?

? ends of Roads
Lundy = M

name is not found in any ancient Latin Martyrologies, nor in the Exeter Calendar of the twelfth century, nor in that of Bishop Grandisson. But she is inserted in Capgrave's Nova Legenda, compiled in 1450 and published in 1516, in Whytford's Martiloge, 1526, in Wilson's Martyrologies, 1608 and 1640, and in seven or eight Welsh Calendars of the sixteenth century.

There was a "Helena, virgo," commemorated in a Dol Calendar of the fifteenth century, and the Welsh Calendars in the Iolo MSS. and Prymer of 1618, on May 22, and in the modern Roman Martyrology, as of Auxerre, on this day; there were two more, one at Troyes, the other at Arçis, commemorated on May 4, but of them also nothing is known.

William of Worcester says that "S^{ta} Elena, mater Constantini imperatoris," was commemorated in the Church at Launceston, but does not give the day. This shows that in the fifteenth century the cult of S. Helen, wife of Maximus, had been transferred to the widow of Constantius Chlorus.

The Church of S. Helen's, Bishopsgate Street, London, was a foundation of the thirteenth century, and the dedication is to the mother of Constantine. At this period, the fable of her having been a British princess was accepted.

S. Helen was a popular saint in Cheshire, where several churches are dedicated to her.

At Paracombe, the Revel with fair is held on August 18. At Abbotsham, the Feast is observed on the Sunday after Midsummer Day. At Helland, the Feast is kept on the first Sunday in October.

S. HELICGUID, see S. ELICGUID

S. HELIE or HELYE, see S. HEILIN

S. HELIG

SOME of the late genealogical lists ¹ include Helig ab Glanog among the Welsh saints; actually he was the father of three Welsh saints, and the account we have of him in a well-known legend scarcely entitles him to that distinction. Our notice of him shall therefore be brief.

¹ Myv. Arch., p. 426; Iolo MSS., pp. 124, 147; also Rees, Welsh Saints p. 298.

The three saints, Boda, Gwynin, and Brothen are in the older pedigrees¹ given as sons of Glanog ab Helig Foel, of Tyno Helig. The later ones² transpose the names Glanog and Helig, so that the latter becomes their father and not grandfather. They also ascribe to him five, six, and even twelve sons. Helig is almost invariably mentioned—as is also Gwyddno of Cantre'r Gwaelod—as the man “whose territory the sea over-ran.”

Tyno Helig, or Helig's Dale,³ was a low-lying tract of land on the north coast of Carnarvonshire, stretching from Puffin Island to Penmaenmawr. Traeth Lafan, or the Lavan Sands, of to-day forms a part of it. Tradition fixes the spot where Llys Helig, Helig's Palace, stood about midway between Penmaenmawr and the Great Orme's Head, over against the hill, Trwyn y Wylfa (neither this name nor Traeth Lafan have anything to do with the “weeping” after the inundation, as is popularly supposed). The neighbouring sailors still affirm that they can trace in calm weather its ruins in the waters below.⁴

Sir John Wynn of Gwydir, in a tract written between 1621 and 1626, gives an account of Helig and the inundation that befell his “moste delicate fruytfulle and pleasant vale,” in which stood his “chieffest pallace . . . the ruynes wherof is nowe to bee seene uppon a grownd ebbe some two myles within the sea directly over against Trevyn yr Wylva . . . unto which hyll Helyg ap Glannog and his people did runn upp to save themsealves, beyng endaungered with the sudden breakynge in of the sea uppon them, and there saved there lyves . . . wryngynge there handes togyther, made a greate outcry bewaylinge there misfortune and callyng unto God for mercy, the poynt of which hill to this day is called Trwyn (r) Wylfa, that is to say the poynt of the dolefull hill or the mowrnynge hill.” He adds, “Helig ap Glannog hadd another manor house att Pullheli, the ruyns wherof is to bee seene neere unto the house of Owen Madryn on the right hand as you

¹ Peniarth MS. 16 and Hafod MS. 16.

² Hanesyn Hên, pp. 35, 118; Cardiff MS. 5, pp. 118-9; Iolo MSS., pp. 42, 106, etc., and the references in note 1.

³ For the use of tyno (in the Book of Llan Dâu, tnou, tonou) in Breton place-names see Loth, Chrestomathie Bretonne, Paris, 1890, p. 167. Traeth Lafan is pleonastic, traeth being prefixed when the meaning of lajan, shore, strand, had been lost.

⁴ The “ruins” have been inspected on several occasions, e.g., in 1864 (Owen Jones, Cymru, i, p. 627), and between 1906 and 1909, but with small results. Mr. Wm. Ashton (Battle of Land and Sea, 2nd ed., 1909, pp. 183-7), who visited them, under favourable conditions, in September, 1908, reports that he observed several perfectly straight lines of tumbled remains of walls, with rectangular corners, and calculated the entire ruin to be from 400 to 500 yards in circumference.

goe out of the towne towards Abererch ; this towne was called Pullhelig, and of late Pullheli." ¹

The popular version of the story is of a different cast. This relates that the calamity had been foretold as a judgment upon Helig for his wickedness four generations before it came about. As he was riding through his territory one evening he heard the voice of an invisible follower warning him, " Vengeance is coming, is coming ! " (Dial a ddaw ! Dial a ddaw !). He asked excitedly, " When ? " The answer came, " In the time of thy grandchildren, great grandchildren, and their children." Helig probably calmed himself with the thought that thus it would not happen in his lifetime. But on the occasion of a great feast held at the palace, and when the family down to the fifth generation were present taking part in the festivities, the butler noticed when going to the cellar to draw more drink for the revelers that the water was forcing its way in. He had time only to warn the harper of the danger, when all the others, in the midst of their carousing, were overwhelmed by the flood. ²

Helig's father, Glannog, has given his name to Ynys Glannog (or Lannog), the old name of Puffin Island. It occurs as Insula Glannauc under the year 629 in the Annales Cambriæ. Giraldus Cambrensis ³ thought the name Enis Lannach (or Lenach) meant " the ecclesiastical island, because many bodies of saints are deposited there, and no woman is suffered to enter it."

S. HENWG, Confessor

THIS saint's name does not occur so much as once in any of the saintly pedigrees, and all that is known of him is to be found in some ¹ An Ancient Survey of Pen Maen Mawr, Llanfairfechan, 1906, pp. 8-11. The tract is printed also in Cambrian Quart. Mag., iii (1831), pp. 39-48, and Arch. Camb., 1861, pp. 140-55. For some interesting details relating to Helig see Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, pp. 454-5. Sir J. Wynn calls Tyno Helig by the name of Cantre'r Gwaelod, which was borne by the land now under Cardigan Bay.

² Y Traethodydd, 1859, pp. 159-160 ; Y Brython, 1863, pp. 393-4. For an amplified version see Cymru Fu, Wrexham, pp. 244-7. Lady Marshall founded upon it her poem, Helig's Warning, " A Cymric Legend of the Seventh Century," London, 1854. For a Welsh libretto on the legend see Odlau Cân, by Robert Bryan, 1901, pp. 153-93.

³ Itin. Camb., ii, c. 7. He evidently took the second part of the name as a derivative of llan.

notices of Taliessin in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ "The Chief of the Bards" is therein said to have been the son of S. Henwg (or Einwg Hên) of Caerleon on Usk, the son of Fflwch Lawdrwm ab Cynin ab Cynfar (or Cynfarch) ab Clydog Sant of Euas—on to Bran ab Llyr. One of the notices mentions him as Henwg Fardd (the Bard) of S. Catwg's Côr at Llanarfarn, whilst another assures us that "Taliessin, Chief of the Bards, founded the church of Llanhenwg at Caerleon on Usk in memory of his father, named S. Henwg, who went to Rome to Cystennin Fendigaid to bring SS. Garmon and Bleiddan to Britain to ameliorate the Faith and renew Baptism." There is, of course, no truth whatever in, at any rate, the latter extravagant statement.

Llanhenwg, or Llanhynwg, now written Llanhenog or Llanhennock, is situated a short distance to the N.E. of Caerleon, and its present dedication is S. John Baptist.² The tower was huge and lofty, but is now no more; only a few stones remain.³ Tennyson refers to it in his Enid—

Now thrice that morning Guinevere had climb'd
The Giant Tower, from whose high crest, they say,
Men saw the goodly hills of Somerset,
And white sails flying on the yellow sea.

An early memorial stone, now at Cefn Amwlch, Carnarvonshire, but formerly at Gors, near Aberdaron, bears the following inscription:—

SENACVS PR̄SB HIC IACIT CVM MVLTVDNEM FRATRVM

(Here lies the priest Senacus with many of the brethren). Senacus was a Goidelic name which appears in Irish as Senach, Seanach, and in Welsh as Henog.⁴ It can hardly be that the patron saint of Llanhenwg is intended.

S. HENWYN, Confessor

In the pedigrees of Welsh saints in the thirteenth century Peniarth MSS. 16 and 45, Henwyn is said to have been the son of Gwyndaf Hên of Llydaw, and periglawr or confessor to Cadfan (his cousin)

¹ Pp. 71-3, 79; cf. p. 144. Lady Llanover in her Good Cookery, London, 1867, p. 1, names him as one of "the three primitive Saints of Gwent," the other two being Gover and Gwarwg. Henog is the name of a brook which falls into the Irfon at Llanwrtyd. For -wg and -og see ii, p. 40.

² B. Willis, Paroch. Anglic., 1733, p. 206.

³ Papers relating to the History of Monmouthshire, 1886, pp. 57-8.

⁴ Sir J. Rhys, Y Cymmrodor, xviii (1905), pp. 92-3.

and the saints that were contemporaries with them in Enlli.¹ In the later genealogies his name occurs under a variety of forms, Hewnin, Hefnin, Hefin, Honwyn, Howyn, Hewyn, and Hywyn. The last is the form most frequently met with to-day.

S. Gwyndaf's wife, and the mother of S. Meugant—and it may be supposed also of Henwyn—was Gwenonwy, daughter of Meurig ab Tewdrig, King of Morganwg. Henwyn's father and brother lie buried in Enlli. In the late *Iolo MSS.*² it is stated that he was a saint or monk of Côr Illtyd at Llantwit, and that he afterwards became a bishop in Enlli.

In Buchedd Llawddog we are told that that saint, who had abandoned his title to succeed his father Dingad as King, used to retire daily to some secret place for private meditation and prayer. His brother Baglan, to gratify his curiosity, one day requested Henwyn to take with him his hand-bell and follow Llawddog to his retreat, that he might know where he went. In the Cywydd to Llawddog by Lewis Glyn Cothi, "Henwyn with his holy bell" is again mentioned, and it would appear from it that this incident took place at Llanfaglan, in Carnarvonshire, and that Henwyn was instrumental in inducing Llawddog to migrate to Bardsey, where he afterwards became abbot in succession to Cadfan.

Henwyn is the patron of Aberdaron, at the extreme end of the Lleyn promontory, whence pilgrims generally crossed over to Bardsey. Aberdaron Old Church has been replaced by another about half a mile off. The saints, or pilgrims, used to meet at a large stone here, called Allor Hywyn, for prayer. The "Altar" no longer exists, having been blasted many years ago. Ffynnon Saint is close to where it stood.

His festival day is not entered in any of the Calendars, but the wakes at Aberdaron are said to have been on January 1 or 6.³

In an obscure poem in the thirteenth century Book of Taliessin, containing allusions to a number of celebrated horses of Welsh legend, occurs the following:—

The good Henwyn brought tidings from Hiraddug.⁴

There was formerly in Bristol, in the very centre of the city, a church

¹ Also Hanesyn Hên, p. 114. In the copy of the Bonedd in Hafod MS. 16 (circa 1400) his name is spelt Hennen. It is Henwyn in Iolo MSS., p. 103. As "Hywyn, in Aberdaron" he is entered among the children of Ithel Hael in Hanesyn Hên, p. 115. There is a Bod Hywyn in the parish of Llanegryn, and over against it, in the adjoining parish of Llangelynin, a Bod Gadfan.

² Iolo MSS., p. 132.

³ Willis, Survey of Bangor, 1721, p. 274; Cambrian Register, iii (1818), p. 224; Cathrall, N. Wales, 1828, ii, p. 118.

⁴ Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, p. 176. Geoffrey of Monmouth (Bruts, p. 69) mentions Henwyn (Henuinus), Earl of Cornwall.

of S. Ewen, now covered by the Council House. At Gloucester and at Hereford were also churches of S. Ewen, destroyed at the Great Rebellion, as they stood outside the walls.

An extinct church of S. Owen or Ewen was in Chepstow, now converted into two dwelling-houses. Just within the mouth of the Wye, on the left or the English shore, at the southern extremity of Offa's Dyke, is an ancient landing-place, called in the Ordnance Survey "Hewan's Rock," but in an inquiry by a Court of Survey in 1641 called "Ewen's Rock."

It has been suggested that these are dedications to S. Hywyn; ¹ but it is very doubtful.

S. HERBAULD, or HERBOT, Hermit, Confessor

"AMONG the saints of Brittany," says Canon Thomas, "none has a more extended cult than S. Herbot or Herbauld, and yet, although the peasants offer him their butter, and recommend to him their cows, they know nothing of his life." ²

His Life was preserved in his church at Berrien, in Cornouaille, till between 1340 and 1350, but perished during the wars of Blois and Montfort, when the English pillaged the church. However, a Life existed there in MS. before the French Revolution, based on oral tradition, and the Bollandists obtained a copy of it and published it in the sixth volume of the Acta Sanctorum for June. It is not an ancient account, and was written in the fourteenth or fifteenth century.

Therein he is said to have been a native of Britain, who crossed the sea into Armorica. The period is not stated, but it was, we may suppose, at the time of the great migration in the fifth or sixth century.

He is said to have settled at Berrien on the southern slope of the chain of the Monts d'Arrée, but the women were angry with him because he drew men away from the work of the fields to hear his sermons, and they stole his linen which he hung on the hedge after a wash. One day they pelted him with stones. He was so angry that he cursed Berrien that it should thenceforth produce little else but stones. According to a proverb, there are four things the Almighty cannot do, level Brazpartz, clear Plouyé of fern, rid Berrien of stones, and make the girls of Poullaouen steady.

¹ Thos. Kerslake, S. Ewen, Bristol, 1875, pp. 2-5.

² Vies des Saints de Bretagne, by Albert le Grand, ed. 1901, p. 663.

Leaving Berrien he came to Nank and asked a farmer there to lend him a pair of oxen for ploughing. The man replied, he had none to spare. So Herbot cursed Nank that thenceforth it should produce only good-for-nothing cattle.

Coming to Rusquec he met with a better reception. A farmer there bade him take from his herd what oxen he chose. Herbot selected two that were white. He harnessed these with the bark of a willow to a bough of a tree, from which he had not stripped the leaves, and thus ploughed his land. Afterwards the two white oxen would not leave him ; but always, even after his death, were to be found at nightfall couched by the porch of his chapel. Any men needing their services had only to borrow them of S. Herbot at night and return them before daybreak. On one occasion, however, a grasping farmer did not restore them, but locked them into his shed. Thenceforth they have been no longer at the service of men, though it is said that sometimes they are still visible at night couched by the porch of S. Herbot.

When S. Herbot had built his oratory he asked for slates to roof it. " Yes," said the man, " if you will chip the slates for me." S. Herbot took off his cap, placed the slates on it and trimmed them thus, giving the slates a perfect shape and doing his cap no harm.

S. Herbot is reckoned one of the richest saints in Brittany. To him are offered cows' tails ; some ten or a dozen of these may be seen suspended on the left-hand side of his altar. The sale of the hair of the tails offered amounts in the year to a good sum, as many as 1,800 lb. of hair being given, and this sells at from 80 c. to 1 fr. 25 c. per lb.

Pilgrims arrive in the month of May. Mondays and Fridays are the days preferred. The cattle are driven round the church, then led to the Holy Well, where they are allowed to drink, and whence also bottles of water are taken for use at home in the event of the cattle falling ill.

The chapel of S. Herbot is near Huelgoet, but in the parish of Loqueffret. It is beautifully situated among beech trees in a valley, at the foot of bleak hills, and a stream comes brawling down in a pretty cascade near by. The chapel of the saint is actually a large church. A few houses about it are converted, during the Pardon, into as many hostleries, and the ample stables and sheds receive the cattle that have come to offer their tails to the saint.

The church possesses a fine square tower without spire or pinnacles. The date is 1516. The west front is fine. Throughout, the carving of the granite is admirable, the foliage is treated with great boldness.

On the south is a deep porch also well sculptured, with the apostles within, and twenty-four little statues in the arcade of the entrance. The date of the porch is 1498. The apse is flamboyant like the rest of the church, but the buttresses are later additions in 1618 and 1619. The interior is adorned with a beautiful renaissance screen and returned stalls, but no roodloft. On the west face the twelve apostles, on that inside the minor prophets and the sibyls. In the chancel is the tomb of the Saint. It is a work of the fifteenth century. There are some old stained-glass windows. That on the south at the east end represents S. Yves between a rich man and a poor suitor. The date is 1556. The central window contains the story of the Passion, that on the north, S. Laurence on the gridiron. The date 1556, which is also probably that of the central window. Outside the screen are two altars piled up with the cows' tails offered to the Saint. Formerly they were hung about the sanctuary. There is a little ossuary on the west side of the porch.

In the Breton Litanies of the ninth and tenth centuries, is the name Hoiarnbiu, but it has no relation to Herbot.¹

The Bollandists give June 17 as the day of S. Herbot, but solely because that is the day of Huarvé or Huervé.

He seems to have had a chapel at Marazion in Cornwall, under the name of Ervetus (B. Stafford's Register, licensed 1397).

In Brittany he has many chapels, mainly in Finistère. He is specially invoked against maladies to oxen and cows.

He is represented on his tomb in monastic garb, with long hair and beard, the right hand resting on a staff, a book suspended from his girdle. Also with staff, holding an open book, and with bare feet, in the south porch. Another statue over the western entrance. Another as an old man bareheaded and barefooted, with an ox at his feet; a statue of the sixteenth century at Guipavas. A good statue of the fifteenth century at Scaer.

S. HIA, Virgin

THIS was one of the Irish settlers in Penwith, Cornwall. According to Leland she "was a nobleman's daughter and a disciple of S. Barricius," i.e. Finbar. He adds that she came with S. Elwyn, and that "one Dinan, a great lord in Cornewaul made a church at Pen-dinas at the request of Iä, as it is written in S. Ië's legend."

¹ Loth, Les noms des saints bretons, Paris, 1910, p. 61.

Unhappily the legends of both S. Hia and S. Elwyn are lost. Dinan is certainly not the name of the lord, but a word which occurs especially in place-names, meaning "a little fortress."

William of Worcester gives us the additional information that she was the sister of S. Euny and of S. Erc.

Now Erc, the foster father of S. Ita and S. Brendan, died in 514. According to the glossator on Oengus he was the father of Eoghain or Euny, but was probably only his spiritual father, as there is another account of Euny's parentage.¹ Eoghain of Ardstraw died about 570. S. Barr or Finbar is difficult to fix. If, as is stated in his Life, he was acquainted with S. Senan, who died in 544, then we may put his death as taking place about 550. Now, it is interesting to find that he did have religious women under his direction, and that one of the foundations in Ireland by a disciple of his was Cill Ia, afterwards occupied by Bishop Lidheadhan or Livan. In one of the Lives of S. Barr, a number of women are mentioned as having been under his direction, but they are nearly all spoken of not by name, but as daughters of so-and-so. One named is Her, and with her Brigid. It is probable that this Her is a mistake of the copyist for Hei, and that she was the foundress of Cill-Ia, and identical with the S. Hia who came to Cornwall. According to the story given by Anselm, Hia resolved to be of the party of Fingar and Piala, but they left Ireland without her. Thereupon she went after them floating upon a leaf, and arrived in Cornwall before them. The myth of the leaf is due to a confusion between her and Hia or Bega, the foundress of S. Bees. This latter is said to have been wafted over on a sod of grass.

What is true in the story is that Hia was one of the earlier settlers in West Cornwall, before the arrival of the swarm under Fingar.

When this second body of Irish arrived, we are told by Anselm, the author of the legend of Fingar, that they found "quoddam habitaculum non longe a litore . . . in quo Virgo quaedam sancta manebat inclusa; et nolens S. Guingnerus eam inquietare, salutata virgine, ad alium locum transiere pransuri."

Fingar and his party landed in Hayle mouth, and went to Hia's settlement hard by; she is the "virgo sancta." But she was ill-pleased at this arrival of fresh colonists and declined to have anything to do with them. This is the probable meaning of the story as given by Anselm.

According to William of Worcester she died and was laid at what is now called S. Ives. This is likely enough, for she has left no cult in

¹ Félire of Oengus, ed. Whitley Stokes, pp. cxxxii, clxvii.

Ireland, nor have several of Barr's disciples, which leads to the surmise that many migrated.

The name Hia is, of course, identical with that of Hieu, who received the habit from S. Aidan, and was placed at Hartlepool, but she belongs to a later date.

Hia had a church, not only at Pendinas, but also at Camborne.

Her feast, according to William of Worcester, was on February 3. It is still so kept at S. Ives, but at Camborne on October 22.

S. Hia's Well, called Venton Eia (Ffynnon Ia), is on the cliff under the village of Ayr, overlooking Porthmeor. It was formerly held in reverence, but has, of late, degenerated into a "wishing well." The spring is under the walls of the new cemetery, and it is doubtful whether the water be now uncontaminated.

There is a representation of S. Hia on the churchyard cross, and she, with S. Levan and S. Senan, are in a window of the church erected in 1886.

In 1409 some parishioners of Lelant complained that they were so distant from their Parish Church, that they found great difficulty in attending service; and they prayed that the chapels of S. Trewenoc, Confessor, and S. Ya, the Virgin, which they had rebuilt at their own cost might be dedicated, and provided with fonts and cemeteries. Bulls from Popes Alexander V and John XXIII were procured, and the chapels were consecrated on October 9, 1411.

S. Hia should be represented, clothed in white wool, as an Irish Abbess, with a white veil, and holding a leaf.¹

S. HOEDLOYW, Confessor

HOEDLOYW was one of the sons of Seithenin, King of Maes Gwyddno, whose territory was inundated by the sea, and now lies beneath Cardigan Bay. After the catastrophe Seithenin's sons all became saints or monks of Bangor on Dee. But all that is known of Hoedloyw is contained in one entry in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ Among his brothers was Gwynhoedl.

¹ The passage relative to her voyage on the leaf runs as follows in Anselm's account of S. Fingar:—"Paullulum jam altius navigando a terra discesserant, cum ecce virgo quædam, nomine Hya, nobili sanguine procreata, pervenit ad littus, felici sanctorum cupiens adunari collegio: cernensque procul a litore jam remotos, nimio anxietate dolore; et fixis in terra genibus, manus et oculos ad sublimia erigens, mente consilium e cælo flagitabat devota. Et modicum inferius relaxans obtutum, contemplatur super aquas folium parvum; et protensa virga, quam manu gestabat, tangens illud, volebat probare an mergeretur. Et ecce sub oculis ejus cœpit crescere et dilatari, ita ut dubitare non posset a Deo illud obsequium missum. Et fide fortis folium audaciter conscendens, mirabiliter Dei virtute prelata, alterum socios prævenit ad littus." Vita S. Fingari in Acta SS., Mart. iii, p. 456.

S. HOERGNOUE, Confessor

Is invoked in the Celtic Litany of the tenth century in the Library of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury.²

In that of S. Vougai he is called Huarneue.³ But De la Villemarqué thought he read Huarve. The writing is faint, and the document greatly injured by damp.⁴

In the list come Hoiardone, who was bishop of Léon, Hoernoué, and Hoiarnuine, whom M. J. Loth equates with Isserninus. He is of opinion that this Hoernoué is the patron of Lan-Houarneau, and that he is distinct from Hoiarnbiu⁵ or Hoarve, the popular blind saint. This, however, is inadmissible. Hoarve was certainly the founder of Lanhouarneau; and no trace of a tradition exists as to another saint of a similar name who can have been confounded with him, as supposed by M. Loth.

S. HOERNBIU, or HUERVE, Exorcist, Confessor

THIS Saint is invoked in the Litany of the eleventh century published by M. D'Arbois de Jubainville,⁶ and also, if De la Villemarqué's reading be allowed, in that of S. Vougai as well, as Huarve.⁷ The name has gone through many forms, Hoearnveo, Hwrveo, Houarvé, Hervé and Harvé.⁸

He is one of the most popular saints in Cornouaille and Léon.

¹ P. 141. With the name compare Hoitliw and Hoydelew in the Record of Caernarvon, pp. 4, 22, 59, 110, and Hoedlyw in the Bruts, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 302.

² Revue Celtique, ix, p. 88.

³ A. le Grand, Vies des SS. Bretagne, new ed., 1901, p. 227.

⁴ Bulletin de la Soc. Arch. de Finistère, 1890, p. 20 seq.

⁵ Revue Celtique, xi, p. 144.

⁶ Revue Celtique, iii, p. 449.

⁷ Le Grand, Vies des SS. Bretagne, new ed. 1901, p. 226.

⁸ De la Borderie, Saint Hervé, gives the various forms assumed by the Saint's name, pp. 254-5.

The Life of the Saint was transcribed in the seventeenth century by the Breton Benedictines, for their collection now called that of the Blancs-Manteaux, which is in the Bibliothèque Nat. of Paris.

They made their copy from three sources :—

1. The Lectionary of Tréguier.
2. The Breviary of Léon.
3. A MS. in the abbey of S. Vincent du Mans.

Moreover, the Père du Paz, who made the transcript, collated the Lives with other MSS. to which he had access, and has noted the variations.

This has been published by De la Borderie, Saint Hervé, Rennes, 1892, with critical examination and notes.

Secondly, we have the Life in Albert le Grand's collection, based on the Legendaria of Nantes and Léon and of Folgoët; also on the Breviaries of Léon, Quimper and Nantes; also on a Life in MS. broken up into lections with hymns and anthems, formerly preserved at le Faouet.

The Life of S. Hervé has also been dealt with by Dom Plaine in Revue de l'Ouest, Rennes, 1893, published separately. Dom Plaine is of no weight as a critic.

The Life of the Saint in De la Villemarqué's La Légende Celtique, Paris, 1859, pp. 318–329, is utterly worthless. It is based on forged ballads, of which a great number appeared under the auspices of De la Villemarqué.

The ancient Life, according to De la Borderie, is of the thirteenth century, but his grounds for basing this opinion are slender. In the Life he is said to have been buried in a shrine made strong with plates of iron and lead. De la Borderie says that wooden coffins only came into use in the twelfth century. But that oaks were scooped out and employed as coffins from a very early period is certain. Stone sarcophagi were indeed employed for all great men, temporal or sacred. But in Brittany there may have been some difficulty in digging one out of granite—no other stone was available—and the earlier use of an oak block sawn in half or dug out may have continued.

However, the character of the Life, its prolixity, the introduction of dialogue, its affectations, show that it is late. Nevertheless it certainly contains some early traditions quite inconsistent with the ideas prevalent in Mediæval cloisters. The redactor took great liberties with his story and doctored it up to suit his idea of what ought to have taken place. We shall attempt an analysis and point out the alterations made by the redactor.

Although Huervé never was in Britain, yet he was the son of a British bard, and his Life is a valuable contribution towards Celtic hagiography.

De la Borderie arbitrarily distinguishes between what he conceives to be ancient and what modern elements in the text. We shall not follow his division; but it may be pointed out that portions of the Life seem to belong to an earlier text, as the style is ruder and the structure is obscure.

Hoarvian was a Briton and a bard, who crossed the seas¹ and visited the Court of Childebert at Paris, where he delighted the courtiers by singing his own ballads, to melodies of his own composition.²

At length the desire came on him to revisit Britain, but he desired first of all to see his countrymen settled in Armorica. Childebert loaded Hoarvian with presents, gave him a letter to Conmore, who was his viceroy in Armorica, ordering him to prepare for the bard a boat to carry him over to his native isle. "Short is the passage between our Domnonia and further Britain,"³ says the author. The King further gave instructions that Hoarvian should be lodged on his journey in the Royal villes on the way.⁴

Here we have the early and genuine record; but when the monastic biographer tells us that as a bard in kings' courts, he was a great giver of alms, assiduous in prayer and vigils, and "ab omni mixtione muliebri semper sejunctus," he is putting his own colours on the picture.

He arrived at the castle of Conmore, who was then in Léon, and rode about with him, and doubtless amused him with his harp and songs at night.

One day as they were out together, they lighted on a spring and saw there a singing girl (quædam psalmista puella), whose good looks, and possibly her voice, charmed Hoarvian; he asked her name, and learned that it was Rivanon, that she lived with her brother Rigur, and that her parents were dead. The chief of their plou was Maltot.

Hoarvian urged Conmore to obtain the girl for him to be his wife; the brother and the chief gave their consent, the girl herself does not seem to have been consulted, and the same night they were married. There was no losing time between love-making and wedlock in those days, apparently.

¹ This is not stated at the outset, but later on.

² "Hic, magnæ industriæ plurimarumque linguarum peritus, sed cantor figmentarius: novos enim fingebat cantus rythmicis compositionibus, quibus imponebat neumatum modos antea inauditos." Saint Hervé, p. 256.

³ "Brevis est transitus maris inter nostram Domnoniam et ulteriorem Britanniam." Ibid.

⁴ "Qui dum abiret per regias sedes," etc. Ibid.

The spot where Hoarvian had met Rivanon was Landouzan, a tref of Drenec near Plabennec in Léon.

Next morning Rivanon cursed the child that would be conceived in her womb, that it should never see the light.¹ Hoarvian was greatly shocked at this outburst; but the curse had been uttered and could not be recalled. When the child was born, he was named Hoernbiu or Hoarve, and he was born blind. Rivanon hated her child; however, she reared it to the age of seven.

All this portion of the story seemed so inhuman and horrible that the compilers of the Lectionary of Tréguier cut it clean away.

The redactor touched it up, and gave it an aspect not quite so savage. He says that Hoarvian had no idea of marrying, indeed had vowed celibacy; but an angel appeared to him in a dream and foretold that he would find a girl by a spring, named Rivanon, and that it was the Divine will that he should marry her, and beget a son who would be a great saint.²

This smacks of the monastery.

The truth was that Hoarvian fell in love with the girl and married her, against her wishes, and this occasioned the explosion of rage and resentment which caused her to curse her unborn child. The imprecation was omitted by Albert le Grand and by De la Villemarqué from their versions of the story. It scandalized them as it did the compilers of the Tréguier Breviary. Both assert what is not said in the Life, that the damsel had also been visited by an angel beforehand, ordering her to marry the bard.

But even De la Borderie reads into the story what he is hardly justified in doing. "La passion ardente et absolue de la virginité nous raporte aux premiers âges du christianisme." Rivanon, we have no reason to suppose, resented being married, only she objected to being married without her consent to a, perhaps, aged bard. He goes on upon his assumption, "la vengeance impitoyable du voeu violé"—we have no hint given us that she had made a vow of chastity—"exercée pas la mère même sur son fils, pauvre enfant innocent encore à naître, est un trait de férocité qui sent l'antique barbarie. Et cela est si vrai que, saufe cette première version de la Vie de S. Hervé, on ne trouve ce trait nulle part. Tous les légendaires de datte posterieures out reculé devant l'odieuse de ce fait ; une mère, par ressentiment, infligeant au fils qu'elle porte dans ses flancs une infirmité cruelle ; la cécité de saint Hervé ayant pour cause la volonté et la vengeance de sa mère—et cependant cette mère tenue pour sainte ! ”

¹ "Si in me genuisti filium, cunctipotentem deprecor Deum ut non videat lumen humanum. At ille: O mulier, quam ingens commissum suæ soboli matrem tam destestabile detrementum imprecari!" Saint Hervé, p. 258.

² "Vult Deus ut filium habeatis electum Sibi . . . non est execrabilis concubitus, ex quo editus fuerit filius salutis plurimorum in æternum profuturus. O quam bonum semen et quam preciosum, quod nunquam desinet Domino facere fructum." Ibid., p. 257.

The author of the Life gives no motive for the curse. De la Borderie supposes one—a previous vow of virginity.

Happily we can compare the procedure of a modern redactor with the old monastic recomposer of the Acts of S. Huervé. This modern redactor is De la Villemarqué, and he is the worse offender of the two. He makes Hoarvian a disciple of S. Cadoc, and quotes the lessons given by S. Cadoc to a pupil, Ystudfach, recorded in the Myvyrian Archaiology,¹ as actually delivered to Hoarvian. He does more. He forges a song sung by Rivanon at the fountain as that heard by the bard when he became enamoured of her. “Although I be, alas, but a simple iris at the water's edge, I am called the Little Queen,” and so on ; and he gives a dialogue held with “the Frank count”—he did not recognize Conmore—as contained in a popular Breton poem. He describes from another ballad, manufactured by himself, the banquet at the wedding. He makes Huervé born three years after the marriage, and Hoarvian to die two years later, and then introduces another fictitious ballad, as the address of Rivanon to her son, and gives the pretended original among the Pièces Justificatives.

If a man who set up to be a scholar, and was held to be honourable, could thus try to impose on his generation, in the nineteenth century, there is some excuse for the hagiographers in the thirteenth playing the same tricks.

This barbaric incident certainly belonged to the earliest Life of the Saint which was re-edited in the thirteenth century, or later. There are other indications of antiquity. The commendation of the bard by Childebert to be lodged in the royal villes on the way, and the mention of the spring being beside the via regalis ; this was the old Roman road that led from Vorganium (Carhaix) to Aber Vrac'h, and which in the Middle Ages had certainly fallen into disuse. So also is the description of the negotiation of the marriage with the chief of the plou or tribe to which Rivanon belonged.

Huervé was born at Lann Rigur, now Lann'oul in the parish of Plouzévédé, but he was brought up by his mother at Caeran, now Quéran, in Tréflaouénau, near Plouzévédé. How this came about is not very easy to discover, as this district is far from the place where Rivanon was married. The idea may have arisen from the fact that a scooped out "cradle" was preserved as a relic at Caeran, probably the original tomb of the saint.¹ All his early life seems to have been passed further west. Rigur, brother of Rivanon, is supposed to be the same as Rivor, founder of Lanrivoaré, where he is represented as a priest.

¹ P. 780.

We hear no more of Hoarvian. His relations with Rivanon were strained, and he probably abandoned her, and returned to Britain.

From a very early age Huervé wandered about as a beggar, with another boy as his guide, whose name is variously given as Guurihuran and Wiuharan, and in late times Guiharan.

As they passed through a village, the peasants who were at their dinner, charitably gave the blind boy some cakes,² and Huervé, seated on a stone, sent his guide to collect alms. Whilst thus seated, a fit of sneezing came on, and one of his milk teeth fell out, and he put it on the stone. The inhabitants of the village saw it blaze like a lamp and increase in splendour till it became a globe of fire radiating light in all directions.³ So as not to frighten the people, Guiharan picked up the tooth and carried it off.

The luminous tooth is a mythologic feature imported into the story. The Harpies had a shining tooth between them, and Odin's horse had one golden tooth inscribed with runes. In the Legend of S. Patrick his tooth plays a part. "One day as he was washing his hands in a ford, a tooth fell out of his head into the ford. Patrick went on the hill to the north of the ford, and sends to seek the tooth, and straightway the tooth shone in the ford like a sun."⁴

Another day the two boys were traversing a village, when a group of little shepherd children yelled after Huervé, "Where are you off to, little blind boy?" No gross insult, but enough to enrage Huervé, who turned and cursed them that they should ever be stunted in their growth, in fact be dwarfs.⁵ Some little time after, passing by the same spot, Huervé struck his foot against a stone and hurt it, whereupon he cursed all the stones of the place that neither iron nor steel should be able to cut them.⁶

The vindictive character of the Saint dominates his whole history, and is very Celtic in appearance; but it must be remembered that in the Apocryphal Gospel of the Infancy, the same vindictive character is attributed to our Lord.

¹ "Ubi ante fores ecclesiæ ejus adhuc exprimitur lectulus." Saint Hervé, p. 258.

² "Occurrerunt sibi incolæ afferentes ex sua farina caritatis amore cibaria. Ibid., p. 259.

³ Ibid., p. 259.

⁴ Tripartite Life, ed. Stokes, i, p. 197.

⁵ Saint Hervé, p. 260.

⁶ Ibid., p. 260.

One day when Huervé was a full grown man, a British tiern or chief of a plou, named Mallo, was robbed by a couple of his serfs, who fled to the coast to take boat, and escape beyond the seas. Mallo went after them, and passed where Huervé was in too great haste to salute him. Huervé cursed him, a storm came on and drove the tiern back, and he was constrained to offer an apology.¹ We shall meet with another instance further on.

The story of the cursing of the children and of the stones looks like a late local legend imported into the Life, and of no more value than that of the men of Stroud having been cursed by S. Thomas à Becket to ever after grow tails, because they had docked his horse.

At the age of seven, Huervé went to a saintly monk named Harthian or Arthian, whom Albert le Grand calls Martianus, and remained with him till he was fourteen, learning grammar and the ecclesiastical chant. Then he departed to a kinsman (consobrinus) S. Urphoed, in the land of Ach.

He asked Urphoed where his mother was, she having retired from the world to lead an eremitical life. Urphoed replied that he did not know, but if Huervé would occupy his cell, and the guide, Guiharan, would attend to his farm and harrow the ground with the ass, he would depart in quest of her. The MS. of S. Vincent du Mans adds, that Urphoed told him she had taken with her a little maid, named Christina.²

After some search, Urphoed found Rivanon, and she consented to see her son.

Meanwhile, a wolf had carried off the ass and eaten it. Huervé prayed, and the beast came to him and submitted to the yoke and did all the farm work hitherto performed by the ass. Much the same story is told of S. Malo and of S. Thégonnec.

Urphoed now returned and informed Huervé of where his mother was to be found, and added that she was in failing health. The youth then departed and saw her, and she begged him to revisit her when she was at the point of death, and that he might be within reach, she bade him request Urphoed to abandon his cell to him. Huervé did so, and Urphoed obligingly departed into the forest of Duna, that once covered Bourglanc, near Plabennec, and much country round.

Huervé now occupied the old cell "cum suis familiaribus et mancipiis," so that he seems already to have been gathering a party about him.³

When Rivanon was dying, Huervé was with her, and administered

¹ Saint Hervé, pp. 266-7.

² Ibid., p. 261, note.

³ Ibid., p. 262.

to her the last Communion. He was only a layman at the time, and it must have been entrusted to him by a priest to convey to her.¹

After having buried his mother, he remained for three years in the cell Urphoed had surrendered to him, and he had many scholars who came to him.

Then he considered it his duty to inquire after Urphoed, and he went in quest of him, but found him dead, buried in his cell, which had fallen into ruins.

He next visited S. Hoardun, Bishop of Léon, who ordained him exorcist, and wandered about taking with him Christina, his mother's niece and companion. His scholars accompanied him wherever he went, so, we are assured, did the wolf.²

At last he resolved on making a permanent settlement, and decided on planting himself by the stream Lyssem, the present La Hèche, that separates the parishes of Lanhouarneau and Plouneventer. He arrived here when the crops were green, and demanded of the owner of a field, named Innoc, to surrender part of it to him. The man demurred; however he consented at last, and Huervé cut down the green corn where he purposed constructing his monastery. At harvest, the remainder of the crop yielded a double quantity. The place has since been called Lanhouarneau.

In or about the year 550 a great conjuration was formed against Conmore, regent of Domnonia. At the bottom of it was S. Samson, but certainly also Gildas was influential in the matter, for he hated Conmore with a deadly hate. Probably also Budoc II was in it, worked up by S. Teilo, acting as a messenger from Samson.

The object aimed at by the conspirators was the destruction of Conmore, and the elevation of Judual or Juthael, son of Jonas, to the throne of Domnonia and Léon.

In order to strike terror into the mind of Conmore, and to impress on the minds of the people a conviction that he was predestined to defeat and death, a convocation was summoned to meet on the Menez Bré, a rounded hill only some 700 feet high, but the most conspicuous in the district, as standing by itself. The author of his Life describes the gathering as "an assembly of bishops and people for the excommunication of Conomerus, prefect of the king."³

It was probably a gathering of saints to curse him, after the manner

¹ "Hoarveus matrem adhuc viventem adiit, cui sanctum viaticum præbuit." Saint Herveé., p. 263.

² "Inde perrexit (Hoarveus) cum discipulis et prævio atque Cristina nomine, genetricis nepta et ancilla." Ibid. p. 264, note.

³ "Conventus præsulum ac populorum, ut excommunicarent præfectum regis Conomerum." Ibid., p. 269.

why, all in 'Conmore' then he was called Conmore here by Juthael son Judual father to Judual usual among Celtic bards, who ascended a hill, and standing back to back looking every way, and stabbing in the air with thorns, uttered a curse which must inevitably bring destruction on him against whom it was launched.

Huervé, who was only an exorcist, was summoned to it, and almost certainly Gildas, who was but a priest.

Huervé, impeded by his infirmity, arrived late, and the assembly waited for him twenty-four hours. When he appeared, ill-formed and covered with rags, one in the gathering exclaimed, "What, have we been kept all day for this little blind fellow?" The remark was not courteous, but Huervé took it in great dudgeon and cursed the man.¹ Thereupon he fell down, his face covered with blood and blinded. At the interposition of the bishops present, Huervé restored sight to the man, by washing his face in water from a spring he miraculously called into existence on the hill.

If we translate this out of the language of a monastic hagiographer, it comes to this—Huervé was late, one of those present found fault with him. This the blind man resented and knocked the man down, by a blow in the face that drenched him in blood. However, when the fellow had washed the blood away, he was all right.

A chapel was erected on the hill to commemorate the miracle, and it still stands there, and the spring is still shown.

A curious story follows.

Huervé returned from Menez Bré with Bishop Hōardon, and the bishop expressed his wish that he could look into heaven and see its glories. Then Huervé prayed and lo! heaven was opened, and he saw the celestial orders there. Then said Huervé, "I will tell you all their names."²

Then Huervé chanted the hymn of Miriam Cantemus Domino, that occurs in the Irish Liber Hymnorum, as one employed in the monastic offices. It was appropriate to the destruction of Conmore, the new Pharaoh. But Huervé added thereto, giving in order the names of all those in heaven beheld by the bishop.³ The writer adds the remark, "Recitabat carmen: Cantemus Domino. Quod, quamvis sit vulgariter editum a prædecessoribus sanctis, est venerabiliter autenticum." By which he probably means that the hymn of Miriam, with the addition in the vernacular, was of old, but that nevertheless it was—or the Cantemus Domino was—an accepted ecclesiastical canticle. But it is not specifically stated that Huervé did make an addition to the hymn. Nothing of the kind exists in Breton at this day except one on the celestial hierarchy and the saints by Michel de Nobletz (1577-1654), which some have supposed to be a recast of the earlier ballad-hymn. But before we can accept this we must first be satisfied that Huervé did more than chant the Cantemus Domino of the Celtic Church in the vernacular.

¹ "Cur me detrahis? Detrimentum luminis quod patior patiaris." Saint Hervé, p. 269

² "Aspice sursum, Cœlestium enim spirituum personas et nomina vobis revelabo." Ibid., p. 271.

³ "Apertum est igitur super eos cœlum, et viderunt omnes choros cœlestium civium, discernentes quosque ordines angelorum atque singulos ordines patriarcharum, prophetarum, apostolorum, martyrum, confessorum atque virginum, audientes suaves melodias eorum." Ibid., p. 271.

One day a fox carried off one of his hens. He addressed himself to prayer, and Reynard returned and delivered up the hen unhurt, to the admiration of S. Hoardon and of Guiharan, “his inseparable companion.” At their desire the prayer he had made was written down, and served for centuries after as a sort of charm against the incursions of foxes into poultry yards.¹

He visited the monastery of S. Majan, at Loc Maljan in Plouguin, near Ploudalmezeau, and Majan presented to him all his monks and disciples. Amongst these was one whose name Huervé asked. The man replied: “My name is Huccan, and I am an Irishman, and a blacksmith and carpenter. I am also a mason. Also a skilful sailor; in a word, I can do anything with my hands.”

“Very well,” said Huervé, “make the sign of the cross on the ground and worship it.”

Huccan hesitated. Thereupon the blind saint ordered him to reveal who and what he really was. And Huccan was compelled to admit that he was an unclean spirit.

Then Huervé ordered the man to be bound and led to S. Goueznou, the brother of Majan. This was done, and the three abbots decided to throw Huccan over the rocks into the sea. From that time the rock has been haunted, as the author informs us. The incident has been softened down by the late biographer. What really occurred was the execution of a troublesome Irishman, who was a scandal to the monastery of S. Majan. To disguise this the biographer represents him as a devil.

As Huervé was now growing old, he announced to S. Hoardon that he would shortly die. When Christina “nonna et consobrinus ejus” heard that, she made petition of him that she might be allowed to die at the same time. On the sixth day of his last sickness, he was visited by Hoardon, and after receiving his benediction, expired. At the same time Christina sank beside the bed and died.

¹ “Quam ipsi, nec mora, scriptam posteris reliquerunt. Quoniam sæpe sæpius, nostris enim temporibus, per hanc fures produntur; vel furta negari nequeunt, aut reperiuntur. Concludium sancti Hoarvei ipsa nuncupata.” Saint Hervé, pp. 271-2.

At the death of S. Huervé were present the bishop Hoardon and the three abbots, Conogan, Majan and Mornrod. Conogan or Guenogan became afterwards Bishop of Quimper. Mornrod cannot be traced. Huervé died on June 17.

We know the period at which Huervé lived, but not the date of his death. Conogan was not yet bishop. He is known to us by a grant made by him to S. Winwaloe, and a pact between them. Winwaloe died in 532. The revolt against Conmore was in 550, and he fell in 555. Unhappily we have no data for fixing the period of Hoardon.

S. Huervé was buried at Lanhouarneau. In 878 his body was taken to the Castle of Brest to save it from the devastations of the Northmen. It remained there till 1002, when Geoffrey, Duke of Brittany, made a present of it to his confessor, Hervé, Bishop of Nantes, who placed it in his cathedral. These relics were lost at the Revolution. At Rennes, however, it is supposed that the skull is preserved.

He is patron of Faouët-Lanvallon, of Lanhouarneau, of Malestroit, of Ploaré, of Saint-Hervé, etc., and has chapels in a great many places.

The statues and representations of S. Huervé are numerous. There is one, a statue of the seventeenth century, at Guimiliau, where he is represented with his wolf. Another at Lampaul-Guimiliau, accompanied by his little companion, Guiharan, and the wolf at his feet with the harness of the ass upon him. One at Kerlaz near Douarnenez, very rude but realistic. He is shown with his eyes open, Guiharan at his side with a whip, leading the wolf.

At Loc Melar near Landivisiau is a side altar with a painting above it of the eighteenth century, very faded; in the centre is the saint conducted by his boy guide. On each side are compartments representing scenes in his life. 1. The Saint, on Menez Bré, eliciting a spring. 2. Huervé with S. Paul of Léon in place of S. Hoardon, with heaven open above. 3. The saint led by Guiharan, and a ladder up which his mother's soul is mounting to heaven. 4. The wolf drawing a cart, under the conduct of Guiharan.

To S. Huervé are attributed certain sayings.

1. Guell eo diski mabik bihan Eged dastum madou d'eghan.	Better teach a child Than store wealth for him.
2. An den iaouank en diegi A zastum poan var benn kozni.	The idle youth Collects trouble for age.
3. An neb a zizent ouz ar stur Ouz ar garrek a zento sur. ¹	Who will not obey the helm Will fall on a sandbank

¹ A. le Grand, Vies des SS. de Bretagne, new ed., 1901, p. 245.

S. HUERVÉ WITH HIS WOLF AND GUIHARAN.

Statue formerly in the Church of Kerlaez, near Douarnenez.

In the MS. Tréguier Missal of the fifteenth century, the Léon Breviary of 1736, that of Quimper, 1835, that of Léon, 1736, that of Redon, 1627, and in the Tréguier Breviary of S. Yves of the thirteenth century, he is commemorated on June 17.

S. Huervé is invoked for sore eyes.

At Marazion in Cornwall was a chapel of S. Ervet (B. Stafford's Register, licensed 1397). It is uncertain whether by Ervet is meant Huervetus or S. Herbotius.

A story is told of S. Huervé that he silenced the croaking of frogs in a marsh; much the same is told of S. Bruno. On this De la Villemarqué remarks, "Or, par une espèce de prodige de la tradition, un chant populaire, intitulé les Vêpres des grenouilles, est venu jusqu'à nous, et il est l'œuvre des bardes païens d'Armorique, représentés dans les récits populaires pieux sous la figure grotesque de ces bestioles croassantes: il offre un résumé des doctrines druidiques du iv^e siècle, et il a paru si nécessaire de le détruire aux premiers missionnaires chrétiens, qu'ils en ont fait une contre-partie latine et chrétienne."¹

Now this Vesper of the Frogs is none other than the "Sing a Song of One, O!" sung throughout Europe, and sung also by Jewish children.²

M. de la Villemarqué published this song in his Barzas-Breiz in 1839. He himself composed and introduced a line into it, to signify that this was a lesson given by a Druid to his pupils. M. Luzel has collected the same song in Brittany, in many places, and has shown that no such a line exists in any version he has found.³

S. HOIERNIN, Confessor

IN the Celtic Litany in the Dean and Chapter Library at Salisbury this saint is invoked.⁴

M. J. Loth says: "S. Isarninos, Iserninos, as eisarno-, isarno-, has given hoiarn, houarn, iron; Iserninos has given Hoiernin (more regular than Hoiarnin), Houernin, in the Cartulary of Redon 860-866, Huernin in 833, to-day Pluherlin, Morbihan; also Saint Hernin in Cornouailles, and Les-Hernin, 1411, Treff-leshernin, 1436, a tref of Séglien, Morbihan (Rosenzweig Dict. top.); transformed by the Romanomania of our clergy into Saint Germain, but it was pronounced Lesernin."⁵

¹ La Légende Celtique, 1864, p. 277.

² On the distribution of this song see Baring-Gould's Songs of the West, London, Methuen, 1892, pp. xxxv-vi.

³ Luzel (F. M.), Sonniou Breiz-Izel, Paris, Bouillon, 1890.

⁴ Revue Celtique, ix, p. 88.

⁵ Ibid., xi, p. 144.

Albert le Grand gives a meagre account of this Saint, based on a MS. preserved at Loc-harn.¹

According to him, this Saint whose name has gone through so much change, was a native of Britain, who crossed over and settled in the parish of Desault near Carhaix. The chief at Quelen promised that he should have as much land as he could enclose in a single day. He took his staff, trailed it behind him and paced along. And the staff not only drew a furrow but made a deep trench and threw up a bank, and Hoiernin enclosed a considerable area by this means. Much the same story is told of other saints, as Goueznou and Brioc. Here Hoiernin lived till his death, and he was buried in his oratory.

The place was ravaged in the war between Conmore and Judicael, and remained desolate till another Count of Poher, named also Conmore, was hunting in the region, when a stag he was pursuing fled to the tomb of the Saint for refuge, and there the hounds would not touch it. He accordingly ordered a church to be built on the spot. Materials were collected, when lo! the birds were found to have gathered twigs and leaves and to have built up a little dome with them over the tomb.

Locarn is near Mael-Carhaix in Côtes du Nord. A bust and relics are preserved in the church. There is a Holy Well surmounted by a thirteenth century statue of the saint in monastic habit, holding a book.

At Saint Hernin near Carhaix, in Finistère, but in the same district, is another statue of him.

Although Albert le Grand speaks of two Counts of Poher named Conmore, there was but one; the erection of the church over the tomb must have occurred before 550, probably some years previously, as during the period just preceding, Conmore was quarrelling with the saints, and not at all disposed to build chapels. This throws back the date of S. Hoiernin. We cannot, however, identify him with S. Isserninus the companion of S. Patrick, for Albert le Grand speaks of him as a Briton, and had his Hernin been the helper of the Apostle of Ireland, he would not have failed to have found this recorded in his Acts.

Hoiernin died on the first Monday in May; but his day is given by Albert le Grand and Lobineau on November 2. Isserninus is called by the Irish Fith.

"Llanyhernyn" is mentioned as a chapel under Llanegwad, Carmarthenshire, in the inventories of Church goods taken by the Commissioners in 1552-3.

¹ Vies des SS. de Bretagne, new ed., 1901, pp. 553-4.

B.P. 1215 1402 1500 Low her stone by Judicael's grant

S. HUAIL, Prince, Martyr ms. found

HUAIL is called Cuillus in the Life of Gildas, by the Monk of Rhuis.¹ He was son of Caw ab Geraint ab Erbin, known as Caw of Prydyn. He was obliged to fly with the rest of his family from the North, owing to the incursions and devastations of the Picts and Scots, and was well received by Maelgwn Gwynedd.

It is possible that in a fit of disgust at being compelled to leave his territories, and in a sudden caprice for religion, he may have accompanied Gildas, his brother, to Brittany, and lived for a while as a recluse on the Blavet. At Melrand, a couple of miles below the grotto into which Gildas retreated, is another grotto to which one Rivallo or Rivalain (Rig-huail) is said to have withdrawn.

The cave is at the confluence of the Sarre with the Blavet, and is about ten feet deep. Here is an image of the saint, and hither in times of dry weather the villagers come in procession to obtain rain, by the intercession of the Saint. Near by also is a settlement of the nephew of Huail, S. Cenydd, locally called Kihouet or Quidi. If this be the same, he soon wearied of the life of an anchorite and returned to Britain.

In the *Iolo MSS.*² he is said to have been a saint of Llancarfan, and to have founded a church in Ewyras, Herefordshire.

The story of the manner in which he lost his life is given by Edward Jones, in his Bardic Museum,³ on the authority of Edward Lhuyd, who derived it from a Welsh MS. in the handwriting of John Jones, of Gelli Lyfdy, dated June 27, 1611. It is accordingly merely a legend and of no historic worth. 95

Huail was so imprudent as to court a lady of whom Arthur was enamoured. The King's suspicions having been aroused, and his jealousy excited, he armed himself secretly, and resolved on observing the movements of his rival. Having watched him going to the lady's house, some angry words passed between them, and they fought. After a sharp combat, Huail got the better of Arthur, and wounded him in the thigh, whereupon the combat ceased, and they were reconciled, but with the proviso that Huail should never mention the matter, under penalty of losing his head.

¹ Ed. Hugh Williams, p. 324, "Caunus ejus genitor et alios quatuor fertur habuisse filios, Cuillum videlicet valde strenuum in armis virum." His name is given as Hywel by John of Tynemouth and others. It is a somewhat rare name, but was borne by a few others, e.g. (as Hueil), in the Book of Llan Dâu, p. 274, and the Record of Caernarvon, p. 102.

² P. 117.

³ London, 1802, p. 22; Peter Roberts, Chronicle of the Kings of Britain, 1811, pp. 360-1. Lhuyd (Parochialia, supplement to Arch. Camb. for 1909, p. 146) mentions the stone thus under Ruthin: "Maen Heol is a flat Stone in y^e middle of the street"; but the stone is neither flat nor in the middle of the Street.

Arthur retired to his palace, which was then at Caerwys, in Flintshire, to be cured of his wound. He recovered, but ever after limped a little.

A short time after his recovery, Arthur fell in love with a lady at Ruthin, in Denbighshire, and, in order the more frequently to enjoy her society, he disguised himself in female attire. One day he was dancing with this lady, thus disguised, when Huail happened to see him. He recognized him by the lameness, and said, "This dancing might do very well but for the thigh." Arthur overheard the remark. He withdrew from the dance, and in a fury ordered Huail to be beheaded on a stone called Maen Huail, still standing in S. Peter's Square, Ruthin.

There was some other cause for disagreement, according to the story of Culhwch and Olwen in the Mabinogion.¹ Huail had stabbed his nephew Gwydre, son of Gwenabwy his sister and of Llwydeu, "and hatred was between Huail and Arthur because of the wound." In the same story it is said that "he never yet made a request at the hand of any lord."²

The Rhuis author of the Life of Gildas says that "Cuillus, a very active man of war, after his father's death, succeeded him on the throne." The author of the other Life, supposed to be Caradog of Lllancarfan, says: "Huail, the elder brother, an active warrior and most distinguished soldier, submitted to no king, not even to Arthur. He used to harass the latter, and to provoke the greatest anger between them both. He would often swoop down from Scotland, set up conflagrations, and carry off spoils with victory and renown. In consequence, the King of all Britain, on hearing that the high-spirited youth had done such things and was doing similar things, pursued the victorious and excellent youth, who, as the inhabitants used to assert and hope, was destined to become king. In the hostile pursuit and council of war held in the island of Minau (Man), he killed the young plunderer. After that murder the victorious Arthur returned, rejoicing greatly that he had overcome his bravest enemy. Gildas, the historian of the Britons, who was staying in Ireland directing studies and preaching in the city of Armagh, heard that his brother had been slain by Arthur. He was grieved at hearing the news, wept with lamentation, as a dear brother for a dear brother." Gildas at once hastened to Wales, full of resentment and desirous of revenge. "When King Arthur and the chief bishops and abbots of all Britain heard of the arrival of Gildas the Wise, large numbers from among the clergy and people gathered together to reconcile Arthur for the above-mentioned murder." ¹ Arthur was obliged to pay blood-money, after which Gildas gave him the Kiss of Peace.

¹ Ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 109.

² Ibid., p. 107.

Apparently the Prince Huail was a vulgar marauder, who richly deserved his fate. Arthur was perfectly justified in executing him for his depredations.

He is distinguished in the thirteenth century Triads of Arthur and his Warriors ² as one of "the Three Diademed Battle-chiefs (Taleithiog Cad) of the Isle of Britain"; and among the "Sayings of the Wise" and the "Stanzas of the Hearing" occurs the following:—³

Hast thou heard the saying of Huail,
Son of Caw, the cautious reasoner?
"Often will a curse drop out of the bosom."
(Mynych y syrth mefl o gesail.)

S. HUNYDD, Matron

THIS was one of the married daughters of Brychan. Her name is thus entered in the Vespasian Cognatio—"Hunyd, que iacet sub petra Meltheu, que fuit uxor Tudual flauī, mater Cunin cof (i. memorie)." In the Domitian Cognatio she is called Ninctis (for Nunidis), whilst in Jesus College MS. 20 she occurs as Goleudyd. In the later genealogies her name, through a misreading, is given as Nefydd, and she is said to have been a saint at the place called Llech Gelyddon in Prydyn, i.e. Pictland.⁴ There seems to be no ground for identifying her husband, Tudwal Befr, with Tudwal, Saint and Bishop, who is nowhere given the epithet Pefr, "the Fair."

Her son, Cynin, is regarded as the patron of Llangynin, in Carmarthenshire.

There is a township of the parish of Cilcain, Flintshire, whose correct spelling would appear to be Llystin Hunydd. The locality of "The Stone of Meltheu" (Mellte) is not known; probably it was in South Wales, where Mellte is a Breconshire river-name, and the parish-name, Bedwelty, in Monmouthshire, means "Mellte's-House."

¹ Vita 2^{da}, ed. Hugh Williams, pp. 400-5.

² Peniarth MS. 45; Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, p. 458.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 253, cf. p. 157; Myv. Arch., p. 128.

⁴ Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 428. Hunydd was not a particularly rare name. See the Record of Caernarvon, p. 320 (index).

S. HUUI, Confessor

IN the grant by Caradog, the son of Rhiwallon, of "Villa Gunhucc, in Guartha Cum," to the Church of Llandaff, in the time of Bishop Herwald (consecrated 1056), mention is made of "the four saints of Llangwm, Mirgint, Cinficc, Huui and Eruen."¹ There are two Llangwms in Monmouthshire—Llangwm Ucha and Isa, which form one benefice, the churches of which are to-day dedicated to S. Jerome and S. John respectively.

This seems to be the only mention we have of Huui. It has been suggested² that his name may possibly survive in that of the parish of Pen-how (S. John Baptist), Monmouthshire.

S. HYCHAN, Martyr

HYCHAN was one of the reputed sons of Brychan. His name does not occur in the Cognatio, only in the late lists of Brychan's children.³ He is patron of the little church of Llanychan, in the Vale of Clwyd.

There is a tradition at Llandebie, Carmarthenshire, that Hychan was slain by the pagan Irish on a field there near the station, called Rhandir Hychan (his share-land or inheritance), but now, colloquially, Cae Henry Fychan. Llandebie Church is dedicated to Brychan's daughter, Tybie, who met with a similar death here, and the tradition states that the Hychan of the field-name was her brother.

Llan-hychan (or -ychan), somewhere in Carmarthenshire, is given in old Welsh almanacks as the name of a place where a fair was held, Old Style, on the second day after Michaelmas, i.e. October 1. It has long since been discontinued; but it occurs in an almanack for 1775, and possibly in later ones, on October 12.

Browne Willis⁴ gives Hychan's Festival on August 8.

S. HYDROC, Hermit, Confessor

OF Lanhydrock, in Cornwall, William of Worcester says that "Sanctus Ydrocus" was a hermit, and that his day, according to the Bodmin

¹ Book of Llan Dâu, p. 274.

² Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, p. 276.

³ Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 426; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 119, 140. With the name Hychan compare that of S. Ehan or Ahan, in Ifendic and Parthenay, Brittany.

⁴ Bangor, 1721, p. 327.

Calendar, was May 5. The name leads to the supposition that he was of Irish origin; it occurs in Irish Martyrologies as Huydhran, and this is the same name as Odran. An is a diminutive employed arbitrarily with oc. We suspect that Hydroc is the Odrhan who was brother of S. Medran or Madron, disciple of S. Ciaran of Saighir. (See under S. MADRON.) In the Irish Calendars his day is October 2, but also May 8; on the latter day as a Bishop. We may equate the Huydhran or Odran of May 8 with Hydroc, May 5. It is possible that William of Worcester wrote viii, which has been incorrectly printed by Nasmith as v.

When Colgan wrote his Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ, an ancient Irish Life of S. Odran was in existence, and he purposed giving this later; but unhappily Colgan did not continue his collection beyond the last day of March, and since his time, the ancient Life has been lost.¹

All we know of him is that he and his brother Medran were sons of MacCraith, son of Frochall, and that they were natives of Littir, now Latteragh, in Tipperary.² The two brothers, as boys, set off on their travels and visited S. Ciaran of Saighir. There S. Medran desired to remain, and place himself under the teaching of this illustrious saint. Odran was much annoyed, and remonstrated with his brother, that this was a breach of their engagement. They referred the matter to Ciaran, who took a candle that had just been extinguished, put it in Medran's hand, and bade him blow on the smouldering wick. If it flamed, he was to remain. If it refused to do so, he was to go on with Odran. The wick, on being blown on, burst into flame, and Odran had to depart alone. As he left Ciaran said to him: "Hear me, brother Odran, I assure you that although you may wander far and wide, you will die in your native place of Littir."³

Odran was one of the disciples of Senan, who assisted to bury him at Iniscathy.⁴

After many travels, Odran did finally come back to Ireland and built a great monastery at Littir, and there he died, according to the Annals of the Four Masters, in 548.

His day in the Martyrology of Tallaght is October 2, but also as Bishop on May 8; on the same day in the Martyrology of Donegal. As the name is not uncommon,⁵ it is not possible to say whether

¹ Colgan, Acta SS. Hib., Vita S. Kierani, p. 461, and note 1, p. 463.

² Ibid., p. 465.

³ Irish Life of S. Ciaran, ed. Mulcahy, Dublin, 1895, pp. 44-5.

⁴ Book of Lismore, p. 221.

⁵ There was an Ódran, S. Patrick's charioteer; another a pupil of S. Columcille; another a disciple of S. Columba of Tir-da-glas; another the father of S. Mochua.

these were the same or different saints. He seems to have been regarded as a tutelar saint of Waterford, and has a Holy Well, Tobar-Odran, near the churchyard of Kilkeiran (Cill-Ciaran) in the parish of Castlejordan.¹

As Ciaran is the Cornish S. Piran, it is not impossible that Odran migrated with him to Cornwall, and that he may be the Cornish Saint Hydroc of Lanhydrock. The fact that the feast there should be on May 5, and his day in Ireland May 8, seems to favour the supposition.

S. HYLDREN, Bishop, Confessor

LANSALLOS church, in Cornwall, is dedicated, according to Bishop Bytton's Register, to Sta. Ildierna; and in Bishop Stapeldon's Register the patron is also given (1320) as Sta. Ildierna.

However, William of Worcester says, "Sanctus Hyldren, episcopus, jacet in parochia Lansalux juxta parochiam Lanteglys; ejus festum agitur primo die Februarii, id est Vigilia Purificationis Beatae Mariae;" and Nicolas Roscarrock enters him on February 1 in his Calendar as S. Ildierne.

Etton, in his Thesaurus, gives S. Alwys as the patron. There was a Welsh S. Elldeyrn, brother of the infamous Vortigern, to whom is dedicated the church of Llanillterne, under S. Fagans, in Glamorganshire. His nephew, Edeyrn, crossed into Brittany, where he has left a mark. It is possible that Elldeyrn may also have quitted Wales, where after the disgrace and ruin of his brother he could not well remain, and settled in Cornwall.

S. HYWEL, Knight, Confessor

HYWEL was son of Emyr Llydaw, and with the rest of his brothers he was forced to fly from Armorica, on account of a family struggle for the supremacy. It has been supposed that they were expelled, or expatriated themselves, to save their throats from being cut by Gallo. But nothing can be said on this subject which is not pure conjecture.

The sole authority for Hywel as a Welsh saint is an entry in the seventeenth century Llansannor Achau'r Saint printed in the Iolo

¹ O'Hanlon, Lives of the Irish SS., x, p. 17.

cf. Llanillterne (S. Alwys)

+ There are other Towns ...

MSS.¹ In this MS. he is called Hywel Faig or Farchog, and is said to have been the father of Derfel Gadarn, Dwyfael or Dwywai, Arthfael, and Hywel Fychan, all saints. It states that he lies buried at Côt Illtyd, Llantwit Major. In the Triads and the Mabinogion tales he appears as a knight of King Arthur's court, which accounts for his epithet Marchog. In the Triads he is mentioned as one of the three "Royal knights" of the Court, who, invincible in battle, were yet so remarkable for their amiable manners and gentle speech that no one could refuse or deny them anything they asked.² In Geraint and Enid he is one of the knights of the court that went with Geraint to Cornwall.³

He is esteemed the patron of Llanhowell, under Llandeloy, Pembrokeshire, and also, it would appear, of the Monmouthshire church spelt Llanhowel in sixteenth century parish lists,⁴ but to-day Llanllowell, and said to be dedicated to S. Llywel. Browne Willis⁵ gives it as dedicated to S. Hoel, with Festival on October 31.

Breton tradition makes Hywel the husband of Alma Pompæa, mother of S. Tudwal. There is no documentary evidence that this was so.

In the Welsh pedigrees he is made the father of Hywel Fychan, so that he would be Hywel Fawr, or the Elder, and the Bretons designate him as Hoel le Grand, or Hoel Meur. They make Hywel Fychan have to wife a daughter of Maelgwn Gwynedd.

He has been laid hold of by the romancers, Geoffrey of Monmouth and Wace, and converted into a gallant prince of Armorica who assisted Arthur in his wars against the Romans. It is doubtful if he ever set foot again in Armorica, after having fled from it in his youth.

S. HYWGI, see S. BUGI

S. HYWYN, see S. HENWYN

S. IDAN, see S. NIDAN

S. IDDEW, Confessor

In the *Myvyrian Archæology*⁶ is entered, as a saint, Iddew Corn Brydain, the son of Cawrdaf ab Caradog Freichfras. In the *Iolo MSS.*⁷

¹ P. 132.

² Myv. Arch., pp. 393, 411, 413.

³ Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 265. In the Dream of Rhonabwy he is one of Arthur's "Counsellors," ibid., p. 159.

⁴ J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 920; Myv. Arch., p. 750.

⁵ Parochiale Anglicanum, 1733. p. 176.

⁶ P. 426.

⁷ P. 123.

the same entry occurs as Iddawg Corn Prydain, the son of Caradog Freichfras. The latter incorrect form renders him liable to be confounded with Iddawg Cordd Prydain, the son of Mynio, one of Arthur's men, who, by his treachery, brought about the fatal battle of Camlan. He figures in the Dream of Rhonabwy. Iddew was the brother of Cathan and Medrod.

S. IDDON, King, Confessor

Book

REES¹ gives as a Welsh saint Iddon, the son of Ynyr Gwent, and brother of SS. Ceidio, Cynheiddon, and Tegiwg. His mother was S. Madrun, the daughter of Vortimer. The genealogies of the Welsh saints do not recognize him as a saint.

Ynyr was succeeded by Iddon as King of Gwent, and several grants of land were made by him to the Church of Llandaff. Llanarth, Llantilio Pertholey, and Llantilio Crossenny, in Monmouthshire, were given during the episcopate of Teilo, the last-named being a grant in gratitude for a victory over the Saxons in answer to Teilo's prayer. Llangoed, the situation of which is not known, was another grant made in the time of Bishop Arwystl.²

Iddon was a good king, but Rees, it would seem, was the first to include him among the Welsh saints. He is mentioned in the Life of S. Beuno³ as having gone to Gwynedd to that Saint in quest of his sister, Tegiwg, who had eloped with a labourer. He killed the man at Aberffraw, in Anglesey, but Beuno raised him to life again. There is a Tre Iddon, above Llyn Coron, not far from Aberffraw.⁴

No churches are mentioned as being dedicated to Iddon. Bettws Wyrion Iddon, "the Bede-house of the Grandsons of Iddon," the old name of Bettws y Coed, is late comparatively, and cannot be regarded as referring to him.

The early form of Iddon was Iudon,⁵ which was also the Breton form, later Iuzon, and is the name of a saint or saints in Brittany, where there are several dedications under the name, viz., Lannion, in Gourin, Morbihan, which occurs in the Cart. de Quimperlé as Laniuzon; Lannion, in Côtes-du-Nord; Lannuzon, in Scrignac, Finistère; and Loquion, in Gestel.

¹ Welsh Saints, pp. 233-4.

² Book of Llan Dâv, pp. 121-4, 166-7.

³ Lyfr Ancr, p. 125; Cambro-British Saints, p. 19.

⁴ It should be stated that Iddon was by no means an uncommon name; see, e.g., the Record of Caernarvon, p. 323 (index). Crogen Iddon is the name of one of the townships of Llangollen.

⁵ See Book of Llan Dâv, p. 407 (index).

S. IDLOES, Confessor

IDLOES, the patron of Llanidloes, Montgomeryshire, was the son of Gwyddnabi ab Llawfrodedd Farfog.¹ Very little is known of him. One *Achau'r Saint*² gives him a daughter named Meddvyth, of whom see under S. MEDDWID.

His festival, September 6, occurs in the Iolo MSS. calendar and in the Prymers of 1618 and 1633. A fair was formerly held (O.S.) at Llanidloes on the first Saturday in September. His Holy Well, Ffynnon Idloes, was situated on the Lower Green, now Hafren Street.

Iolo Goch,³ Owen Glyndwr's laureate, invokes his protection in a poem, and Lewis Glyn Cothi,⁴ in the next century, says of one of his subjects—

He was an aged knight, of good morals,
Like Sadwrn or Idloes.

Among the "Sayings of the Wise" triplets occurs the following :—⁵

Hast thou heard the saying of old Idloes,
A peaceful man, amiable in his life?
"The best quality is that of maintaining morals:"
(Goreu cynneddf yw cadw moes):

In the "Stanzas of the Hearing"⁶ the "saying" differs slightly :—

"The best prosperity is the maintaining of morals."
(Goreu cynnydd cadw moes).

S. IDUNET, Confessor

In the Celtic Litany of the tenth century from the Library of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury, published by Canon Warren,⁷ S. Ediunete is invoked; in that published by Mabillon, he is called Idunete.⁸

¹ Hafod MS. 16; Hanesyn Hên, pp. 37, 120; Myv. Arch., p. 426; Cambro-British Saints, p. 268. His grandfather, Llawfrodedd Farfog (Farchog in a few rather late MSS.), is celebrated in Welsh legend. He was one of "the Three Tribe-Herdsman of the Isle of Britain"; he tended the kine of Nudd Hael, in whose herd were 21,000 milch cows (Myv. Arch., p. 408.) His own cow, Cornillo, was one of "the Three Chief Cows" of the Island (Péniarth MS. 16); whilst his knife was one of "the Thirteen Treasures" of the Island; it would "serve four and twenty men at meat all at once" (Y Brython, 1860, p. 372).

² Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 118; Llanstephan MS. 81, p. 2.

³ Gweithiau I.G., ed. Ashton, p. 533.

⁴ Gwaith L.G.C., p. 332.

⁵ Iolo MSS., p. 251.

⁶ Myv. Arch., p. 127.

⁷ Revue Celtique, ix (1888), p. 88.

⁸ Vetera Analecta (ed. 1723), ii, p. 669.

A Life of the Saint is in the Cartulary of Landevenec, at what date composed there is nothing to show.¹ The Vita is curious, for up to a certain point it calls the Saint Idiunet, and thenceforth Ethbin.

Capgrave, in his Nova Legenda, gives John of Tynemouth's condensation of the Life. He calls the Saint throughout Egbinus, and does not once use the name Idunet.

M. J. Loth considers that two distinct saints were confounded together.² But we are rather disposed to think that the Life as a whole belongs to an Ethbin, but was clumsily adapted by the compiler of the Cartulary of Landevenec to make it apply to Idunet.

Idunet was a genuine personage. He occurs in the Cartulary of Landevenec as a brother of S. Winwaloe, "non post multum tempus sanctus Uingualoeus iter edidit ad fratrem suum Edunetum," who lived near what is now Châteaulin, but was then known as Castelnin.³ "Ædunetus occurrit sancto Uingualoæo ridens cum venientem ad se, et seipsum sancto Dei commendavit, id est, corpus et animam et spiritum et omnia quæ habebat, et terras quas Graalonus rex sibi dedit."

In the Life of S. Winwaloe no mention whatever is made of this brother, and it is impossible to accept this record as sufficient authority for making Idunet a son of Gwen Teirbron.

Idunet had no Life, and the monks of Landevenec, lacking one, took that of a different saint, Ethbin, who was associated with a totally different Winwaloe, a monk of Taurac, and adapted it to their purpose, but so clumsily, that in part of the narrative they substituted the name Idunet for Ethbin, but not throughout. John of Tynemouth possessed, not the Landevenec manipulated Life, but the original Vita of S. Ethbin, and he does not speak of the saint as having borne the other name of Idunet. How clumsy the work was may be judged, moreover, by this. In the Vita the parents of Idunet are named, Eutius and Eula; and nevertheless in the Cartulary he is given as "brother" of Winwaloe, son of Fracan and Gwen Teirbron.

We are disposed to think that Idunet was a kinsman, possibly a half-brother of Winwaloe, who lived where is now Châteaulin, and that the Vita in the Cartulary has nothing whatever to do with him. See S. ETHBIN.⁴

He is patron of Châteaulin, where his pardon is on the fifth Sunday after Easter; of Pluzunet (Plou-Iduneti), near Plouaret, Côtes-du-Nord; of Trégourez, near Châteauneuf, Finistère; and he has chapels

¹ Cart. de Landevenec, ed. De la Borderie, Rennes, 1888, pp. 137-41; Acta SS. Boll., October, viii, pp. 487-8.

² Revue Celtique, xi (1890), p. 141.

³ Cart. de Landevenec, ed. De la Borderie, p. 145.

⁴ ii, pp. 466-7.

of Plouñévêzet near Carhaix, and Laurenan by Merdrignac, Côtes-du-Nord.

At Trégourez the Patronal Feast is held on the third Sunday in October.

At Pluzunet is an eighteenth century statue of him in Benedictine habit. Idunet, under the form Ediunet, is invoked in the tenth century Litany published by Warren, and as Idunet in that in the Missal of S. Vougai.¹

S. IESTYN, Hermit, Confessor

IESTYN, son of Geraint ab Erbin,² King or Prince of Domnonia, was the founder of Llaniestyn in Carnarvonshire, where is also the church of his nephew, S. Cybi. He probably followed Cybi to Anglesey, for he is patron there of another Llaniestyn, where is a stone with an effigy, bearing an inscription purporting that he was buried there.

Iestyn is represented, in low relief, in the garb of a hermit of the fourteenth century, with a bouïdon or staff, terminating at the top in a dog's head, in his right hand. The slab has on it, in Lombardic capitals, the following inscription:—"Hic Iacet Sanctus Yestinus Cui Gwennlian Filia Madoc Et Gryffyt Ap Gwilym Optulit In Oblac(i)o(n)em Istam Imaginem P(ro) Salute Animarum S(uarum)." It formerly stood in front of the altar, on a raised mass of masonry, but is now placed vertically in the wall. The shrine which enclosed the relics of the saint is gone. The sculptor who designed and executed this interesting effigy appears to have sculptured also that of S. Pabo in Llanbabo Church. Both are of the fourteenth century.³

Iestyn was brother to Cador, Duke of Cornwall, Caw, Cyngar, and Selyf. In the Iolo MSS. he is said to have been a saint of Côr Garmon at Llancarfan.

¹ Revue Celtique, xi, pp. 136-141.

² Peniarth MSS. 12, 16; Hanesyn Hên, pp. 109, 121; Cambro-British Saints, p. 270; Myv. Arch., pp. 421, 427; Iolo MSS., pp. 101, 116, 136. The name Iestyn is the Latin Justinus. In Breton it is Iostin and Iestin. There is a Ker-istin in Marzan, Morbihan. In the Taxatio of 1254 Llaniestyn, Anglesey, is entered as "Ecc'a de Lanyustin." Eastington, a manor in the parish of Rhoscrowther, Pembrokehire, was formerly called Iestynon.

³ Arch. Camb., 1847, pp. 324-5. At p. 289 there is an engraving of the effigy. For a description see ibid., 1874, pp. 217-24; also Westwood, Lapidarium Walliæ, 1876-9, p. 196.

He may have been the founder of S. Just-in-Roseland, in Cornwall, a part peculiarly affected by the royal Domnonian family, and not far from S. Gerran's, his father's church, and Dingerein, the royal palace. But if so he has been supplanted by a Justin or Just in the Roman Calendar ; it is impossible to say by which. There are in that Calendar twenty-three Justs and seven Justins.

He was probably forced to quit Cornwall at the same time as Cybi, in consequence of the dynastic conflict hinted at in the Life of S. Cybi, when Constantine made himself king.

It is possible that he may be the Justin whom we meet with in Brittany at Plestin (Plou-Iestin). He had occupied a cell there, but left on pilgrimage. Whilst he was absent, an Irish colonist, Efflam, arrived and took possession of his cell. When he returned he found his cell occupied and the land around it appropriated by the Irishman. According to a local legend, the controversy as to the right to the habitation was settled amicably between them by this means. Each seated himself within the cabin, and they waited to see on whose face the setting sun would shine through the tiny window. Presently the declining orb broke from its envelope of cloud, and sent a golden ray in through the opening and irradiated the countenance of Efflam. Thereupon Justin arose, saluted him, and seizing his staff, departed.¹ They would seem, however, to have compromised matters. It was arranged that Efflam should rule the ecclesiastical, and Justin the secular community. This is obscurely related by the biographer of Efflam, a late writer, who did not comprehend the tribal arrangements in vogue at an earlier period. What he says is that Justin gave his name to the plou or plebs, and that Efflam took the headship of the lann ; and that they agreed to live at some distance apart.

The place where Justin settled is now by contraction called Plestin (Plou-Iestin), and in the church S. Justin is represented as a priest.

The festival of S. Iestyn does not occur in any of the Welsh Calendars. Festivals were held at Llaniestyn, Anglesey, on April 12 and October 10, and at Llaniestyn, Carnarvonshire, on October 10.²

The day on which he is said to be commemorated in Brittany is April 19 ;³ but churches bearing his name have been transferred to S. Just, Bishop of Lyons, who died in 390, and whose day is September 2.

The feast at S. Just-in-Roseland is August 14. If we deduct eleven days we have August 3. There is no Just or Justin commemorated in the Roman Calendar on either of these days.

¹ Le Braz in Annales de Bretagne, T. xi, p. 184.

² Willis, Survey of Bangor, 1721, pp. 275, 282 ; Cambrian Register, iii (1818), p. 224. Nicolas Owen, Hist. of Anglesey, 1775, p. 58, gives April 15.

³ Kerviler and De la Borderie, but neither gives his authorities ; both apparently follow Garaby. The Pardon is on the Fifth Sunday after Easter.

A Iestyn ab Caden (Cadan, or Cadfan) ab Cynan ab Eudaf ab Caradog ab Brân Fendigaid is in late genealogies¹ represented as having been a saint, some generations earlier than the son of Geraint, but his existence is very doubtful. They are given the same ancestry.

S. IEUAN GWAS PADRIG, Monk, Confessor

THIS minor Welsh saint has been more fortunate than many of the more important ones, for we have had preserved for us his Life, in Welsh. There is a copy of Buchedd Ieuan Gwas Padrig in Llanstephan MS. 34, written in the sixteenth century, and another in MS. 104, written in the following century, in the same collection. The Life, however, as we have it, cannot be much, if any, earlier than the sixteenth century. It has never been published.

Ieuan² ab Tudur ab Elidan ab Owain Fychan ab Owain ab Edwin Frenin was born in Llwyn, a township of the commote of Ceinmeirch, or Cinnerch,³ now lying within the parish of Llanrhaiadr, near Denbigh. He was a disciple of S. Patrick: hence his epithet Gwas Padrig, "the servant of Patrick," which, as a personal name, Anglicised to Gospatrick or Cospatrick, was borne by the well-known eleventh century Earl of Northumberland. With it compare the Strathclyde names Quos-Cuthbert, Cos-Mungo, and Cos-Oswald. A number of Welshmen in early and mediæval times bore names thus formed, among them Gwas Dwyw (Duw), Gwas Crist, Gwas Mair, Gwas Mihangel, Gwas Dewi, Gwas Teilo, and Gwas Sant Ffraid. They are translations or imitations of a well-known Goidelic formula, probably of pre-

¹ Myv. Arch., p. 427; Iolo MSS., p. 118, cf. pp. 101, 116.

² Sometimes he is called Ifan or Evan. Ieuan, Iefan, Ifan, Iwan, and Ioan are all Welsh forms for John. Evan Evans is none other than John Jones, only less Anglicised. Ieuan's pedigree cannot be genuine. His father's name is also given as Llywelyn; thus the entry in Llanstephan MS. 187 (c. 1634), p. 237, "Euan ap llywelyn, gwas Patrig, fanach, sant Cerig y Dridion, ar llwyn yngeinnech." He is associated with S. Mary Magdalene in a cywydd written in her honour by Gutyn Ceiriog, of which copies occur in Llanover MS. B. 1, fo. 63a (c. 1670), and Cardiff MS. 26, p. 99.

³ For its boundaries and extent see Williams, Records of Denbigh, Wrexham, 1860, pp. 46-7. At p. 58 is mentioned "Gavel Waspatrik" as being in Denbigh. Quimerch, which occurs in Breton charters as Ecclesia de Keynmerch, Keinmerch, and Keymerch, is near Châteaulin, in Finistère.

Celtic origin. Gwas Padrig is represented in Ireland by Mael-Phatraic (now Mulpatrick), meaning, literally, "the tonsured man (or devotee) of Patrick," and in Scotland by Gille-Patraic, "the servant of Patrick." Compare also Mael-Brighde and Gille-Brighde, "the servant of Brigid." The formula implies that the person so named was under the charge, or was born on the day (or some other connexion) of that particular saint.

According to his Life, Ieuan was a worker of miracles; but those recorded are stock instances, and have been often attributed to others. He wrought his first miracle, when a boy of twelve, by killing an infuriate adder that was aiming at a drainer, and he had his prayer granted that "there should never till Doomsday be seen an adder in that land," and, moreover, no "venomous vermin" should ever hurt those who offered to Ieuan. One season the crows and other birds devastated his father's and other persons' crops to such an extent that he was moved to "drive them all before him into his father's barn." Tudur was so impressed with the youth's performances that he sent him with his blessing to Menevia to become a disciple of S. Patrick.

He was there for some time, and when the great Apostle, in obedience to the warning voice, left Wales for Ireland, Ieuan also with others accompanied him. But Ieuan was not destined to remain in Ireland long. One day S. Patrick, whilst preparing to say Mass, sent his Welsh disciple to fetch fire. Ieuan went to the cook, and returned with the glowing embers in his lap, without his garment having been even singed. S. Patrick, in compassion for the Welsh, that they should not be deprived of having so great a wonder-worker in their midst, requested him to return to his native country. Ieuan bade his master farewell and went down to the shore, but could find no means of embarking. In his perplexity he prayed, and saw a blue slab floating on the surface of the water towards him; and on this he safely landed on the coast of Anglesey. He now felt very thirsty; he thrust the point of his staff into the ground, and forthwith bubbled up a crystal spring.

"From thence he came to Llwyn in Ceinmeirch—to his own patrimony—and contemplated making a cell there for prayer to God. He has in Llwyn thirteen wells."¹ An angel, however, told him not to erect his cell there but to proceed southwards until he spied a roebuck, and on the spot he saw it rise there to establish his cell. "And he came to the place that is called Cerrig y Drudion, and there built he his cell, where is a church dedicated to Ieuan Gwas Padrig and Mary Magdalene.”

¹ An Artesian well, sunk in 1906 at Llwyn Isa, about two miles from Denbigh, provides the town with an abundant supply of the purest water.

The church is now regarded as dedicated to S. Mary Magdalene¹ alone, and the Gwyl Mabsant or wake followed her festival, July 22. Ffynnon Fair Fadlen is near the church, but her earlier well was in Caeau Tudur.

Edward Lhuyd (1699) gives an interesting early MS. note from the Parish Register, which shows that Gwas Padrig was, previously to the Reformation, represented in stained glass in the chancel window of Cerrig Church, but the glass has long since disappeared. “Ieuan ap Llewelyn of Kinmeirch surnamed Gwas Patrick as written by his picture at y^e east end of Kaer y Drydion written A^o. 1504. Evanus Patricius animarum confessor was y^e 1st founder of y^e Ch: of K. y Druidion in y^e year of our Lord 440 and dedicated it to M: Magdalen. It was afterwards repair’d and augmented A^o. 1503.” Lhuyd mentions his Holy Well, Ffynnon Gwas Padrig, as possessing very cold water, which cured swelling in the knees, etc.; and another well, Ffynnon y Brawd, the Friar’s Well, which removed warts, etc. In the terrier of 1631 are named as part of the glebe, Bryn y Saint, and Erw’r Saint.

By a deed dated 1506, in consideration of the small income of the benefice, certain messuages and tenements were added, “ad laudem Dei et Sanctæ Mariæ Magdalenæ ac Sancti Ieuan nuncupati Gwasbatryc vanagh patroni ibidem.”²

From the fact that his Life brings him to Anglesey Ieuan may be one of the patrons of Llantrisant in that island. Browne Willis³ gives that church as dedicated to the three saints, Sannan, June 13, Afan (sometimes spelt Afran), December 17, and Ieuan or John, August 29. The last date is the festival of the Decollation of S. John Baptist, but it is hardly possible that by this Ieuan is meant the Baptist. The parish is situated on the side of the island that Ieuan would be likely to land, and not far from the coast.

Nothing further seems to be known of Ieuan Gwas Padrig.

Several clergy named Iouan (O. Welsh for Ieuan) occur in the Book of Llan Dâv. Louan, more correctly perhaps Iouan, was one of “the learned men and doctors that flocked to Dubricius for study,”⁴ and this same disciple was probably the clerical witness to several grants by King Pepiau of Erging to the church of Llandaff.

¹ B. Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 364.

² MS. D, fo. xxxiv b, in the Episcopal Library, S. Asaph.

³ Bangor, p. 279.

⁴ Book of Llan Dâv, p. 80.

One of the "Sayings of the Wise" triplets runs ¹:—

Hast thou heard the saying of Ifan,
 Brother in the Faith to Catwg of Lllancarfan?
 "A grain of sand shines its destined best"
 (Tywynid graienyn ei ran).

S. IFOR, Bishop, Confessor

IFOR is said to have been the son of Tudwal (Saint and Bishop), the son of Corinwr, of the mythical line of Brân Fendigaid. He was a bishop, but we are not told of what see, and the founder of a church in England.² He was not a son of Hunydd (Nefydd), daughter of Brychan, as has been assumed.³ He is not known to the earlier authorities; and in all probability by him is intended the "Eborius Episcopus de civitate Eboracensi provincia Britannia,"⁴ who was present at the Council of Arles, 314.

Ifor is one of the many saints, mainly Welsh, to whose guardianship a poet in an Ode to Henry VII commits that king.⁵

Giraldus Cambrensis⁶ mentions the entire expulsion of rats from Ferns by the curse of S. Yvorus, bishop, "whose books they had probably gnawed." This was Ibharr, bishop of Beg-Eire, Begery Island, in Wexford Haven, who died in 500 or 505, and is commemorated on April 23.

S. ILAN, Bishop, Martyr

BUT little is known of this saint. He is the patron of Eglwys Ilan, in Glamorganshire, which is called Merthir Ilan, that is, the martyrium of Ilan, in the Book of Llan Dâu.⁷ Sometimes the church is given as dedicated to S. Helen,⁸ and even to S. Elian. In the Taxatio of 1254 the church occurs as Eglisulan, in that of 1291 as Eglisilan, and in the Valor of 1535,⁹ as Egloysylan. Trefilan, in Cardiganshire, usually regarded as dedicated to S. Hilary, bears Ilan's name. A late, untrustworthy list¹⁰ of the early bishops of Llandaff includes Ilan.

¹ Iolo MSS., p. 254; cf. Myv. Arch., p. 859.

² Iolo MSS., pp. 116, 136.

³ Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 148.

⁴ Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, etc., i, p. 7.

⁵ Iolo MSS., p. 314.

⁶ Topog. Hibern., Dist. ii, c. 22 (Opera, v, p. 120, ed. Dimock, 1867).

⁷ Pp. 32, 44.

⁸ Willis, Llandaff, 1719, append., p. 1.

⁹ iv, p. 350. Elan and Ylan are also met with. For the substitution of Llan and Eglwys for Merthyr see Cymmrodorion Transactions, 1906-7, pp. 85-6.

¹⁰ Liber Landavensis, p. 623.

There is a Bod Ilan in Llanfihangel y Pennant, Merionethshire ; and S. Ilan is the name of a castle near S. Briec, Côtes-du-Nord.

S. ILAR, Martyr

THE late documents printed in the Iolo MSS. give two Welsh saints of this name. One,¹ an Ilar who came to this island with Cadfan, and has a church dedicated to him in Glamorganshire, by which is evidently meant S. Hilary, near Cowbridge. It is, however, dedicated to S. Hilary. The other,² Ilar, son of Nudd Hael, by whom, of course, is intended Eleri, the son of Dingad ab Nudd Hael, the Elerius of the Life of S. Winefred by Prior Robert of Shrewsbury, and the patron of Gwytherin, Denbighshire.

Ilar is the Welsh form of the Latin Hilarus, just as Eleri is of Hilarius. These two Welsh saints are constantly confounded with the great S. Hilary of Poitiers, as is also Elian Geimiad.

The only church that can, with any degree of certainty, be said to be dedicated to Ilar is Llanilar, in Cardiganshire, with which he is associated under the name Ilar Bysgotwr,³ or the Fisherman. But this church is also claimed for S. Hilary.⁴

The Welsh Calendars give the festival of S. Ilar in January, but are rather undecided as regards the day, the 13th, 14th, and 15th being assigned him.⁵ Similarly, though the festival of S. Hilary should be on January 13, the day on which he died, as in the Anglican Calendar, the 14th is that marked in the Roman Calendar, the alteration being made that the day might not interfere with the Octave of the Epiphany.

In the sixteenth century Demetian Calendar (S), which gives Ilar on the 15th, he is called Ilar Ferthyr, or the Martyr, with the addition, "or rather Droedwyn," that is, "the White-footed."

Lewis Glyn Cothi,⁶ in the fifteenth century, invokes his protection

¹ P. 108.

² P. 139.

³ Myv. Arch. p. 426.

⁴ B. Willis, Parochiale Anglic., 1733, p. 195. The Glamorganshire church is given as "Ecclesia S. Hilarii" in the Book of Llan Dâu, see index. The following are some of the sixteenth century Welsh spellings for it, "Sain tilari," "Saint y lari," "Sain Hilari (or Eleri)"; Dr J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, pp. 827, 919

⁵ See i, p. 70. By "Gwyl Seint Ilar" in Brut y Tywysogion (ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 349) is clearly meant the Festival of S Hilary.

⁶ Gwaith L.G.C., 1837, pp. 88, 337. So also in the Ode to Henry VII, Iolo MSS., p. 314. In "Cywydd y Prynys Arthur" by Dafydd Llwyd, in Llanover MS. B. 1, fo. 33b, occurs the couplet—llaw vaeno drosto rag drwg ag jlar rag drwg olwg.

for the subject of one of his poems, and alludes to his festival as "Gwyl Ilar hael a'i loer hir," "the Festival of the generous Ilar with his long moon."

SS. Ilid and Ilud

ILUD is entered as one of the unmarried daughters¹ of Brychan in the Vespasian Cognatio, but she is not in the Domitian copy. The name would now be Iludd. In the list of his children in Jesus College MS. 20 the name was miscopied by the fifteenth century scribe as Llud, and he adds that she is commemorated "yn Ruthun ygwlat Vorgant," that is, in Rhuthyn, the manor and commote of the name in the Vale of Glamorgan, embracing the parish of Llanilid, which the scribe evidently implied derived its name from her. He seems to be the sole authority for the association, and though the Church of Llanilid may have been originally dedicated to her, it certainly at an early date came to be regarded as under the invocation of S. Julitta and her son, the child-martyr S. Cyriacus.

Its full Welsh designation has always been "Llanilid a Churig," as for instance in the parish list, circa 1566, in Peniarth MS. 147. In the Taxatio of 1254 it is called "Ecclesia Sancte Julite," and this, or something similar, has been the prevalent form in Latin documents.² For Ilid = Julitta see further under that name.

In "The Genealogy of Iestyn ab Gwrgant," the eleventh century prince of Glamorgan, we are told that Eurgain, wife, as supposed, of the historical Caratacus or Caradog, sent for S. Ilid, "of the land of Israel," from Rome to Britain, to assist her in the conversion of the Welsh. "This Ilid is called, in the lections of his Life, S. Joseph of Arimathæa. He became the principal teacher of the Christian Faith to the Welsh, and introduced good order into Côr Eurgain, which she had established for twelve saints, near the church now called Llantwit." He afterwards went to Glastonbury, "where he died and was buried, and Ina, king of that country, raised a large church over his grave."³

¹ It occurs as the name of a layman in the Book of Llan Dâu, p. 149.

² In a will of 1690 it is called "Saint Juliet's"; G. T. Clark, Limbus Patrum Morganicæ, 1886, p. 393.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 7; cf. p. 219. Joseph of Arimathæa is called Ilid also in the Cwydd to S. Mary Magdalene by Gutyn Ceiriog, referred to under S. IEUAN GWAS PADRIG.

We are further told that S. Ilid, "a man of Israel," came hither with Brân Fendigaid from Rome, that he converted many of the Welsh to Christianity, Caradog and Eurgain among them, and that he is the patron of Llanilid in Gwent.¹ A house in that parish, called Tre Brân, is supposed to confirm the connexion of this "man of Israel," that is, Joseph of Arimathæa, with the place.

The following occurs among the "Sayings of the Wise"² :—

Hast thou heard the saying of S. Ilid,
 One come from the race of Israel?
 "There is no madness like extreme anger"
 (Nid ynyfdrwydd ond trallid).

This saint can only be regarded as "a man of straw," being the creation of some of the late mediæval Glamorgan antiquaries, who were familiar with the legend of the Holy Grail, most probably through Walter Mapes.

S. ILLID, Bishop, Confessor

ACCORDING to William of Worcester, Illid, Ilid, or Elidius, a Bishop, reposed in one of the isles of Scilly. Elsewhere he calls the island "Insula Seynt Lyde (fuit filius regis)." Leland says: "Saynt Lide's Isle, wher in tymes past at her Sepulchre was grete superstition."³ Either her is a misprint for his, or else Leland confounded Lyde of Scilly with Lidgy of Eglosruc or S. Issey.

William of Worcester says that his day in the Tavistock Calendar was August 8. As the Abbey of Tavistock had a cell in Scilly, its calendar is likely to be correct in describing him as a Bishop.

S. ILLOG, Confessor

THE genealogies know nothing of this Welsh Saint, but his festival, August 8, entered as "Gwyl Illog yn Hirnant" occurs in a good number of the earlier Welsh Calendars. In the Calendar in Additional MS. 14,882, written in 1591, the entry is "g. Illoe abban sant," which includes apparently one of the two Irish Saints of the name Abban. He is patron of the little church of Hirnant, in Montgomeryshire. His holy well, Ffynnon Illog, once much resorted to for its mineral properties, is near the church, and a tumulus on an eminence, called Carnedd Illog, is supposed to cover his remains. Here also are Gwely Illog, his Bed, and a brook, Aber Illog.

¹ Iolo MSS., pp. 100, 115, 135, 149-50. Cyndaf was likewise "a man of Israel."

² Ibid., p. 255.

³ Itin., iii, 9.

Browne Willis¹ gives the dedication of Coychurch, in Glamorgan, as to Illog, but this church, called in Welsh Llangrallo, is dedicated to S. Crallo.

But Browne Willis can't have imagined the of Illog (near Westford) 269

S. ILLOGAN, Priest, Confessor

THE Church of Illogan, near Redruth, in Cornwall, is dedicated to a saint of this name.

In Bishop Bytton's Register, the designation is "Ecclesia Sti. Elugani," also Yllugani, 1309-10. So also in the Register of Bishop Stapeldon, 1307-8. In that of Bishop Stafford, the church is that of "Sancti Illogani de Logan," and "Sancti Illogani alias Illugani," 1397-1403; but in the latter year, also "Seynt Lukanus." In that of Bishop Grandisson, 1352, "Sancti Illogani," also 1360 and 1366. So also in those of Bishop Brantyngham, 1374, 1382, 1383.

S. Illogan may be the same as the Illog of the Welsh Calendars, and Illogan Parish is probably the Landhillok of the Blanchminster Manumissions.² The -an of Illogan is a diminutive. There is no record of the parentage of Illog in the Welsh pedigrees, and it is therefore possible that he may not have been a native.

It will not do to insist on Illog and Illogan being identical. The Feast at Illogan seems against this, as it is on October 18, whereas S. Illog's day is August 8. But what does seem possible is that Illogan is the same as the Irish Illadhan or Iolladhan, a native of that part of Southern Ireland which poured so many saints into Cornwall. His father was Cormac, King of Leinster. His aunts, Feidhlem and Mergain, had been baptized by S. Patrick, as had also his grandfather, Ailill, King of Leinster, at Naas, in 460.

After the death of Cormac, his son, Cairbre the Black, succeeded, reigned eleven years and died in 546.

Illadhan's sisters were Eithni and Derchartain, whom we are disposed to identify with Stithiana of Stythians and Derve of Camborne.

¹ Survey of Llandaff, 1719, append., p. 3; Paroch. Anglic., 1733, p. 200.

² Goulding, Blanchminster Charity Records, 1898.

Illadhan was a priest at Desert Illadhan, now Castle Dillon; he was married, and was the father of S. Criotan or Credan, disciple of S. Petrock. He belongs to a later date than that of the great migration, and his settlement in Cornwall must have been due to some other cause, if we may equate Illogan with Illadhan.

In 543 occurred the plague called the Blejed, and this was followed in 547 by the terrible Yellow Death, or Cron Chonaill, that raged till 550. It swept Wales as well as Ireland. Many Saints fled across the sea with their disciples and families, under the impression that they would escape infection if they put a tract of sea between them and the afflicted region. This may have been the occasion of the migration of S. Illadhan. That he went further is possible. A certain Ellocan had a cell in the forest that occupied the centre of Armorica. When Judicael was king, one Laurus, a British monk, asked for a site, and Morona, wife of Judicael, obtained that Ellocan should be turned out, and his foundation given to the new and more favoured saint.¹ Judicael came to the throne in 610. It is possible that this Ellocan may be the same as Illogan, but if so he must have been advanced in age. He can hardly have remained in Brittany, as he received no cult there.

Unhappily, no Life of this Saint has come down to us. In Ireland he is known only as having been in priest's orders, and having led an eremitical life where is now Castle Dillon. That he died there we do not know. William of Worcester says that he was informed by the Dominicans of Truro that S. Illogan's body rested in the church that bears his name. In Illogan was a chapel at Selligan (S. Illogan) that may have been his ancient cell.

He had a chapel, according to Lysons, at South Pool in Hartland. It may, however, be doubted if the Illocan or Helligan there be the same.

S. Iolladhan is commemorated in Ireland on February 2; but is not included in the Calendar of Oengus. Gorman designates him as "venerable, great-faced."

S. ILLTYD, Abbot, Confessor

THE Life, the sole Life that we have of this remarkable man, is extant in three MSS. :—(1) In Cotton. Vespasian A. xiv, ff. 43b-52, of the early thirteenth century, printed in Cambro-British Saints, pp. 158-182; (2) in Cotton. Tiberius E. i, part ii, ff. 101-102b; and (3) in Bodl. Tanner 15, f. 34. The two latter are John of Tynemouth's abridgment of the first. This has been printed in Capgrave's Nova Legenda Angliæ, ed. Horstman, 1901, pp. 52-6. Lobineau, however, in his Vies des Saints de Bretagne, has composed a Life, derived mainly from Capgrave, but also from the ancient Breviaries of Léon and Dol.

¹ Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B., viii, c. 64; Vita S. Lauri in Bibl. Nat. Paris MS Français, Blancs Manteaux xxxviii.

The Life is a late composition. It mentions Robert Fitzhamon (died 1107) as ruling over Glamorgan; but it was written before the appearance of Geoffrey of Monmouth's fabulous History, for it makes Dubricius Bishop of Llandaff, and not Archbishop of Caerleon. Arthur is indeed spoken of as "a great conqueror," but there is nothing in the story about his extraordinary achievements.

Into the narrative have been taken portions from the Life of S. Samson, but he is not made an Archbishop of Dol. The writer mistakes Samson, Abbot of Llantwit, who was buried there and had an inscribed cross, with Samson of Dol, who lived three hundred years earlier, and fabricates a legend to explain the existence of his body and stone at Llantwit. The Life of S. Cadoc was also laid under contribution. Nevertheless, the Vita S. Illuti is doubtless based on an earlier Life, which has been expanded with the additions aforementioned, and with traditional incidents.

Much perplexity has arisen relative to the date at which Illtyd lived, on account of the statement made that he was appointed head of Caerworgorn by S. Germanus of Auxerre. It is impossible to reconcile this with his date as Master of Saints, Gildas, Samson, and Paul. But this difficulty partly vanishes if we accept the Germanus in question as having been the Armorican, who became Bishop of Man, and not the Auxerre Saint of the same name. But Germanus cannot have appointed Illtyd to Caerworgorn, as he died before Illtyd was converted. The mistake springs out of the fact of Illtyd having been in early life a pupil of Germanus.

Illtyd was a native of Letavia, i.e. Armorica, or Lesser Britain. Among those who fled from Britain and settled in Lesser Britain was one Bicanus, of noble birth and military prowess. He was married to Rieingulid, daughter of Anblaud, King of Britain.¹ Amlawdd Wledig, as we know from Welsh sources, was married to Gwen, daughter of

¹ "Bicanus, miles famosissimus, illustris genere, et in armis militaribus. . . . Tantus vir eximie nobilitatis voluit uxurare et hereditari ex filiis, velle com-
plevit, uxorem ducens filiam Anblaud, Brittannie regis Rieingulid; hæc vocata voce Britannica, quando latinetur, sonat hoc regina pudica." Cambro-British Saints, p. 158. In the Nova Legenda her name is spelt Rieinguilida. In modern Welsh the name would be represented by the component words rhian or rhian and gwyl or gwylaidd, with the meaning of "a modest lady."

Cunedda Wledig, and was the father of Eigyr or Igerna, and grandfather of Arthur. Rieingulid had as sisters Gwyar, the wife of Geraint ab Erbin, and Tywanwedd, the wife of Hawystl Gloff. One pedigree makes Bicanus the son of Aldor, and brother of Emyr Llydaw, but according to another account Aldor was the father of Rieingulid.¹ In either case, Germanus the Armorican would be their uncle, and Illtyd his great-nephew.

Illtyd² was the fruit of the union, and he had as brother S. Sadwrn. He was educated in "the seven sciences" by Germanus, and was with him for awhile in Paris, and had Brioc as his fellow pupil.³ But he had no desire to embrace the monastic life, and, leaving the Continent, he crossed the sea and served under King Arthur, who, according to one account, was his first cousin,⁴ and this is borne out by the Welsh pedigrees. He married a wife, Trynihid, a virtuous woman.

After awhile he quitted Arthur, and attached himself to Poulentus, King of Glamorgan. This was Paul of Penychen—a cantref in Mid-Glamorgan—uncle of S. Cadoc, and brother of Gwynllyw, King of Gwynllywg, between the Usk and Rumney rivers.

One day he was out with a party of the retainers of Paul, when they rudely demanded food of S. Cadoc, which, after some demur, he granted to them. The story is told much more fully in the Life of S. Cadoc. The men were out hawking, and were fifty in number. Cadoc gave them twenty wheaten loaves, a barrel of ale, and a pig, which they roasted for their dinner. Illtyd had strayed from the party, and was not privy to their violence. Misfortune befell the fowlers, for they were engulfed, doubtless got into a morass, and some, if not all, lost their

¹ In the Iolo MSS., pp. 113, 131, 148, the confusion is carried still further.

² His name occurs under a variety of forms—Iltutus, Ildutus, Hildutus, Eldutus, Ulltyd, Illtyd, Illtud, Elltyd, etc. In the grant of Pembrey church to the Abbey of Sherbourne he is called Elthut (Dugdale, Monast., ed. 1846, iv, p. 63). According to his biographer he was named Iltutus because "he (ille) was safe (tutus) from every sin." Iolo Morganwg, in Llanover MS. 2, p. 93, observes that it "is a name still pretty common in the Parish of Lantwit, particularly in the antient Family there of the Nicholls, who generally give that name to the eldest son (and whom I suppose to be descendants of this Saint)!" The form Illtyd is an Anglicized spelling. Iltutus occurs among the "Archbishops" of London. In Llantwit the first syllable of the name has been elided. Illtyd Farchog is made to bear arms—"Arg., 3 masts, 3 tops of castles or and 6 darts or;" Llyfr Baglan, ed. Bradney, London, 1910, p. 309.

³ Vita S. Brioci, ed. Plaine, c. 9. He is mentioned in the Vita S. Samsonis (Book of Llan Dâw, p. 10) as "Abbas Ildutus Sancti Germani discipulus humana et divina peritus."

⁴ "Audiens interea miles magnificus Arthuri regis sui consobrini magnificentiam," etc., Cambro-British Saints, p. 159. Illtyd is frequently called in Welsh Illtyd Farchog, i.e. the Knight.

lives.¹ This has been magnified into the earth opening her mouth, and swallowing them all up.

Illtyd was so thankful for his preservation from being smothered in the festering slime that he went to Cadoc and asked his direction. Cadoc advised him to assume the clerical tonsure and abandon the military profession, and he resolved on following this recommendation. His early training under Germanus had left a deep trace on his mind, that had for a while been covered over, but which now revealed itself as ineradicable.

The narrative of the Conversion of S. Illtyd as given in the two Lives introduces a chronological difficulty that must be solved. As it stands it is out of perspective with the whole chronology of the Life of S. Cadoc, for how is it possible that Illtyd, who, as a child indeed was with Germanus the Armorican, who died in 474, can have been converted by Cadoc, who died in or about 577?

The story of the conversion is in its earliest form in the Life of S. Illtyd, and was thence taken into the Life of S. Cadoc.

It will be seen at once that this story is a reduplication of that of Cadoc and the warriors of Sawyl Benuchel; but with the introduction into it of the episode of Illtyd's conversion.

We would suggest that there is a basis of fact in the story. Illtyd, who at the time was in the service of Paul of Penychen, was hunting, when some of his party got engulfed in a morass and perished. This so affected the mind of Illtyd that he resolved on renouncing the world. Now the author of the Life of S. Illtyd had heard the tradition of Cadoc and Sawyl Benuchel and the swallowing up of his soldiers, and he assumed that the two incidents were the same. He corrected, as he thought, the name of the chief from Sawyl to Paul, and—being ignorant of chronology—took for granted that Cadoc was then at Nantcarfan. The author of the Life of S. Cadoc read this story in the Life of S. Illtyd and transferred it to his Life, unconscious that it was but a cooking up of his hero's experiences with Sawyl.

As a matter of fact, when Illtyd was converted, Cadoc can hardly have been born, or at all events, have been more than an infant.

The only other way of escape from the difficulty is by assuming that there was an earlier Cadoc, but, as we have shown,² of that there is no evidence.

Illtyd, accordingly, withdrew from the service of Paul of Penychen, and went, "accompanied by his wife and attendants," to the banks of the Nadauan, i.e., the Dawon or Thaw, in South Glamorgan, "and it being summer-time, he constructed a covering of reeds, that it might not rain upon their beds ; and while their horses were depastured in the meadows, they slept the night away, their eyes being heavy."

¹ Cambro-British Saints, pp. 45-6.

² ii, pp. 12-14.

During the night, Illtyd brooded over what had been advised by Cadoc, and a dream served to confirm his resolution. He had shrunk from speaking to his wife of his change of purpose, but now he determined to speak out.

At dawn he roused her from sleep, and told her to leave the hut and look after the horses. "She departed naked, with dishevelled hair, that she might see after them." The wind was high in the raw early morning, and the unhappy woman's hair was blown about. Presently she returned with the information that the horses had not strayed, and, shivering with cold, she attempted to get into bed again. But, to her disgust, Illtyd roughly told her to remain where she was ; he threw her garments to her, and bade her dress and be gone. The poor woman clothed herself and sat down, sobbing, at his side. But steeled against all kindly and pitiful feelings, he announced to her his intention of quitting her for ever ; and, resolute in his purpose, he dressed himself and departed for the Hodnant, a pleasant dip, shallow among low hills, and watered by a tiny stream. It was well-wooded, and seemed to him a suitable spot for a retreat. Having made up his mind to settle there, he went to S. Dubricius, and before him he was shaved and assumed the monastic habit. Then he returned to Hodnant, and Dubricius marked out for him the bounds of a burial place, and in the midst of this Illtyd erected a church of stone and surrounded the whole with a quadrangular ditch.¹ Here he lived an ascetic life, bathing every morning in cold water, and rising to prayers in the midst of the night.

Hodnant, which the biographer interprets as signifying "The Fruitful Valley" (Vallis Prospera),² lies in a sheltered hollow, but commands the low level country that stretches to the Severn Sea. Above it stands a height crowned by an ancient camp now called the Castle Ditches. "Every spring-time glowing masses of golden gorse, while in autumn the red and yellow of the bracken, and the olive-green of countless blades of grass" make of it "a miracle of colour. We hear the dull boom, boom, boom, of the angry waves as they break on those foam-fringed cliffs which guard the coast to east and west of Castle Ditches, just as they were heard by those men who lived, laboured, and taught here centuries ago. We see the white gulls circle round the cliffs as if they were never weary of being on the wing; we see the blue dome above us with the great clouds sailing majestically across; we see the ever-restless, ever-changing ocean, now blue, now purple, now a mass of molten gold at sunset. All these things we see to-day, and they gladden our hearts just as they gladdened the heart of Illtyd when he rested from his journey, and 'the delightful place pleased him well.'"¹

¹ "Construens in primis illico habitaculum, presule Dubricio designante cemiterii modum, et in medio . . . oratorii fundamentum. His designatis fundavit ecclesiam munimine lapideo facto, et quadrangularem super ambientem fossam." Cambro-British Saints, pp. 163-4.

² There is a Hodnant also at S. David's, and another in the parish of Bryngwyn, Radnorshire. The name would now be more regularly Hoddnant. The hagiographer treated the name as being compounded, apparently, of hawdd, hodd-io, and nant.

But Hodnant, or rather some part hard by, had, according to some late documents printed in the Iolo MSS., been previously occupied by a School for Saints, called by the various names, Caer Worgorn, Côr Tewdws,² and Côr Eurgain.³ Some writers have located the Romano-British city of Bomium or Bovium at Llantwit⁴ while others suppose it to have been at the village of Boverton, a mile to the S.E., or at Cowbridge. But the college had been destroyed by the Gwyddyl pirates, and when Illtyd settled there all was desolate. That he was appointed over the college of Caer Worgorn by Germanus of Auxerre is an error. His old master, the Armorican, may very possibly have had something to do with its regulation, but we cannot admit that he founded Llantwit, and placed Illtyd over it.⁵

If we may trust the Iolo MSS.,⁶ Illtyd's congregation grew rapidly, and at one time numbered three thousand "saints" or monks. Laus perennis was kept up without cessation night and day.⁷

It is stated in the *Book of Llan Dav*⁸ that Illtyd was made abbot of Llantwit by S. Dubricius, who, we are further informed, "visited the residence of the blessed Illtyd, in the season of Lent, that he might correct what wanted amendment, and confirm what should be observed."⁹ It does not, however, appear that Celtic bishops had any jurisdiction over the monasteries within their dioceses.

¹ Fryer (A. C.), Llantwit Major, London, 1893, pp. 9-10. Leland, Collectanea, 1774, iv, p. 93, gives the following tradition: "Est etiam in illa regione quidam locus, vocatus vulgariter locus Scti. Iltuti, cujus precibus, ut fertur, obtinuit a domino, ut nullum animal venenosum infra præinctum illius parochiæ esset, nec ut animal huc usque visum est aliquod vivum, mortuum tamen dicitur illic."

² The site of Côr Tewdws is marked on the Ordnance Map in a field to the north of the church, where the foundations of early buildings have been discovered. See Rodger (J. W.), The Ecclesiastical Buildings of Llantwit Major (illustrated), Cardiff, 1906.

³ ii, pp. 416-7.

⁴ For the discovery of Roman remains in the neighbourhood of Llantwit, see Arch. Camb., 1888, pp. 413-7; 1894, pp. 253-5.

⁵ iii, pp. 62-3.

⁶ Pp. 144, 149-51

⁷ Myv. Arch., p. 408.

⁸ P. 71.

⁹ Vita S. Dubricii in ibid., p. 81.

One day Meirchion, King of Glamorgan, was hunting, when a fawn he was pursuing fled for refuge to the cell of Illtyd, and the King, on entering, saw the panting beast crouched at the feet of the abbot. He did not venture to kill it, and Illtyd pacified Meirchion by the offer of a meal, as he was hungry after his sport. The King, however, grumbled at what was given to him, broiled fish, without bread and salt, and water from the spring. However, he satisfied his cravings thereon, and then lay down to sleep. On waking he was in a better temper, and confirmed Illtyd in his holding of the Hodnant valley as his own, and granted that he should make of it a tribal school.¹ Illtyd kept the fawn with him and tamed it to draw wood and do other light domestic tasks.

The incident took place at an early period, before he had many disciples. When he had security of tenure, disciples flowed to him from every quarter, among them men of good family. "He cultivated the land, he sowed and reaped, and lived by his labour. He had labouring men to till the soil (operarios cultores) in the fields. Seed multiplied, and toil met with abundant reward. . . . He had a hundred in his family, as many workmen and clerics, and poor, a hundred of whom he fed daily at his board."² He had as scholars Samson, Paul (of Léon), Gildas and David.³ He was accordingly the first great Teacher of Saints in Wales.

He is thought to have had, at one time, under him Maelgwn, afterwards King of Gwynedd. Gildas, in his Increpatione, says to this prince, "Warnings are certainly not wanting to thee, since thou hast had as instructor the refined teacher of almost the whole of Britain."⁴ He does not name Illtyd, but he very possibly may speak of him. Then Maelgwn and he would have been fellow-pupils, and Gildas spoke from his own knowledge when he described the excitement and pleasure among the godly caused by Maelgwn's conversion, or the hopes it inspired.

¹ "Vestrum gymnasium erit venerabile, tributarii tibi servient et omnes indigenæ." Cambro-British Saints, p. 167. According to the local tradition, Illtyd's "Golden Stag" is buried here somewhere, with his feet to the west, and when discovered great prosperity will come to Llantwit.

² Ibid.

³ In the Life of Paul the same are mentioned, but in that of Gildas David is omitted. Strangely, the former Life identifies Illtyd's monastery with a small island on the borders of Demetia, which was once called after Pyrus, but at the time of writing after Illtyd. This would be Caldey Island, known in Welsh as Ynys Pyr (or Byr). On the difficulty raised, see Gildas, ed. H. Williams, pp. 332-4; and for the inscribed stone on Caldey, on which it has been suggested Illtyd's name occurs, see Y Cymmrodor, xviii (1905), pp. 56-7, and Arch. Camb., 1908, pp. 247-9; 1910, pp. 332-4.

⁴ Gildas, ed. H. Williams, p. 82.

The property of Illtyd increased largely, and he was ordained priest. Hard by, as already stated, had been the Romano-British city of Bovium, and the Roman settlers had banked out the Severn tides from the rich alluvial lands along the coast. But the sea-wall had given way : it had been neglected and left unrepaired, so that the high tides overflowed. Illtyd employed his pupils and workmen in restoring the banks with stone and clay.¹ But his first attempts were doomed to failure ; three times did he repair the walls, and as often did the strong tides, driven before a west wind, crumble his banks away. For awhile his heart failed, and he meditated abandoning the flats. But he recovered from his temporary discouragement, and a fourth attempt proved successful.

In the meantime, his poor deserted wife, Trynihid, had been living in involuntary widowhood, in a little retreat, where she spent her time in good works. "She prayed constantly, she was found blameless and irreprehensible in her conversation, and lived devoutly, comforting innumerable widows and poor nuns in their vocation."

At length an irresistible longing came over her to see her husband again ; and, leaving her retreat, she sought him out. On reaching Llantwit, she saw a man working in the fields, lean, and with a dirty face, and, going up to him, recognized Illtyd. In her delight at meeting him once more she spoke and endeavoured to engage him in conversation ; but he turned his back on her, and refused to speak and to answer her questions. He denied her the common kindness of a hospitable lodging, and she went away sorrowful, "looking as pale as if she had suffered from a fever."² And they never met again.

King Meirchion had a steward named Cyflym, who grievously annoyed Illtyd. He grudged his tenure of the rich pasture land by the Severn without paying tax to the King, and took every occasion that offered to vex the Saint. At length the annoyance became so intolerable that Illtyd left, and spent rather over a twelvemonth in a cave at Lingarthic, on the river Ewenny, famous for its gwyniad, a salmon-like fish of delicious flavour, deriving its name from the silvery brightness of its scales.

¹ "Operatus est immensam fossam limo et lapidibus mixtam, quam retruderet irrudentem undam, quæ solebat fluctuare ultra mensuram." Cambro-British Saints, p. 168.

² "Interea visitare voluit Sanctum Illtutum, et iter capiens visitavit, ubi operosum vidit fossorem per assidua fossura, lutulentum per faciem, macies quoque tenuaverat faciei superficiem ; inquisivit ab eo suave colloquium, displicuit inquisitio audienti, inquisitus nullum reddidit responsum. . . . Reversa est postea sic ante, nevis et pallore contexta, ac veluti febricitans pallida." Ibid., p. 172.

Illtyd had not gone to a great distance, but he remained concealed there, near the old Roman road; and probably Ewenny Priory afterwards, early in the twelfth century,¹ sprang up on the site hallowed by his temporary stay.

Whilst there he was one day sunning himself outside his cave, and watching the travellers who went by to the bridge over the Ewenny and Ogmere, when he heard the tinkle of a little bell, and presently a man came in sight who carried in his hand one of those bronze angular bells common in Celtic lands, and it shone in the sun like gold. A bell exercised a peculiar fascination on a Celtic Saint, and he hastened to the man to look at what he carried, and sound it himself. His eyes sparkled with delight, and his ears drank in the rich tones of the bell with pleasure. He inquired whether it were for sale. "Oh, no," replied the man, "I am taking it to David in Menevia. It has been fashioned by his fellow pupil, and your old disciple, Gildas, and he sends it to David as a present."

Reluctantly the Saint surrendered the bell, and the man went on his way. But when David heard the story, and knew that Illtyd had handled the bell and delighted in it, "Go," said he, "take it to my old master from me. He shall possess it."²

After a year's retirement Illtyd returned to his monastery. The steward Cyflym was now dead, but his successor, Cefygid, was even worse disposed, and this man exercised great influence over Meirchion, and embittered him against the abbot, so that, sorrowfully, Illtyd had to retire once more from his charge, and returned to his cave by the Ewenny, where he now spent three years.

On the death of the second steward, who perished miserably in crossing a swamp, he returned to Llantwit, and thenceforth remained unmolested.

Hearing that a famine was afflicting his native Armorica, as there was abundance of corn in his granaries Illtyd ordered vessels to be laden with as much as could be gathered together, and, along with these corn-ships, he sailed for Brittany. The biographer says that he desired to visit Monte Tumba, in Normandy, and the Church of S. Michael thereon, but this is an anachronism, as the supposed apparition of the Archangel there did not take place till about 710, when Autbert, Bishop of Avranches, pretended to have seen the vision, and erected the Church.

¹ Turbervill, Ewenny Priory, London, 1901, p. 35.

² Cambro-British Saints, p. 175. An ancient building at Llantwit, now used as the town-hall, has in its belfry a bell inscribed, "Sancte Illtute, ora pro nobis." The local tradition declares, but mistakenly, this bell to be the original bell of the Saint. Edgar, when he invaded Glamorgan, carried his bell off, but afterwards restored it.

Actually, Illtyd, we may be confident, landed in Léon, in the Aber-Ildut, that bears his name to the present day, and he founded a church near the mouth, Lanildut. But he probably did not stay there, as no other traces of him are found in this neighbourhood.

He put off with his corn-ships again, and, coasting round the north of Léon, entered the Jaudy, and floated up with the tide as far as La Roche Derrien. From this point inland he has left several indications of his presence. What the natives specially needed at the time was seed-corn, and with this he provided them.

Their gratitude was great, and they urged him to remain in his native land. This, however, he was unwilling to do, and after having discharged the contents of his vessels, remaining perhaps over a couple of winters, possibly even longer, he returned to Glamorgan.

This expedition to Armorica was purposed for some further object than relieving the temporary needs of the people. The whole of the peninsula was being rapidly colonised by settlers from Britain, and Illtyd visited it to see whether there was a prospect there of founding daughter-houses to Llantwit.

That he went into Cornugallia, or Cornouaille, appears certain, as near Guéméné, now in Morbihan, is a plou that bears his name, and a plou implies the foundation of an ecclesiastical or secular tribe. This is Ploildut, now Ploerdut, and he is still culted there as patron. Moreover, in the Monts d'Arée is his peniti, or place of retreat from monastic cares, Loc-Ildut in Sizun. Half-way between the plou and the peniti is Pleyben, a foundation of his great-uncle Germanus.

At last he resolved on returning to Glamorgan, greatly to the regret of the people of Letavia. "The citizens wished him not to go back, but to remain in that country; yet he would not stay there although so greatly desired, and he chose to dwell in Britain, although an exile from his paternal ancestors."

When well advanced in age, he became, however, impatient to be back in the land of his birth, and to lay his bones there. Accordingly, he again embarked, and landed in the Bay of Mont S. Michel. He died, if we may trust the biography, at Dol. But Dol had not at that time been founded by Samson, who was in Cornwall when the news reached him of the decease of his old master.¹

The story as told in the Second Life of S. Samson is this: Whilst Samson was in his monastery, apparently at Southill, in Cornwall, a disciple of S. Illtyd came to him, who had himself formerly been a pupil of Samson. The latter asked him how it fared with S. Illtyd, and whether he was still alive.

¹ Vita 2da S. Samsonis, ed. Plaine, c. 18.

The monk replied that Illtyd had been ill and failing, when there came to him two abbots to visit him, one named Isanus, and the other Athoclus. When he saw them, the old man said to them, "I rejoice exceedingly to behold you, my brothers, for the time of my departure draweth nigh, and my soul will soon rest with Christ. But, brethren, be comforted, for the time of your own departure is not far distant. At the third watch of the night, I, in your presence, shall be borne to heaven by the hands of angels, and brother Isanus shall see the angels in the form of golden angels carrying my soul away. And on the fifteenth day following brother Athoclus shall pass to his rest, and you, Isanus, shall in like manner behold his soul borne away by angels as eagles having feathers of lead. And after forty days shall Isanus finish his course and go to Christ. But you, brother Athoclus (elsewhere Athoclus), loved much the things of this world. On account of your avarice the angels will have leaden instead of golden wings. But you are clean, because you have lived a saintly life from your infancy, only you are weighed down by your money-greed. God, however, will purge this out of you."

And as Illtyd had foretold, continued the monk, so was it. At the third watch of the night the old man passed away, and Isanus had a vision of his spirit being borne to heaven amid hymns, and attendant crowds of angels. But as to the two abbots, Athoclus and Isanus, it was with them as Illtyd had prophesied. Athoclus accordingly must have died on November 21; Isanus, however, on December 16.

When Samson heard of the death of his old master, he said, "The soul of my venerable teacher Illtyd is now in possession of eternal life, where death never comes and has no power to hurt. Blessed is that life in which death fears the dead."

Whence the two abbots came we are not told, nor, what is more to the point, where Illtyd was when he died. The monk who reported his decease may have come from Brittany or from Wales.

Isan is known as having been a saint of the college of Illtyd, and as the founder of Llanishen, in Glamorganshire, and of Llanishen, in Monmouthshire. Athoclus, or Atoclius, cannot be traced. He is as unknown to the Bretons as to the Welsh. Perhaps his avarice stood in the way of popular canonization.

The death of Illtyd must have taken place before 546, which is the latest date to which can be attributed the passage of Samson into Armorica. It took place some time between 527 and 537, on November 6.¹

¹ In the Iolo MSS., p. 103, it is stated that he was succeeded in the abbacy by Peirio, the son of Caw; but he is clearly confounded with Pirus, head of Caldey.

Germanus was probably in Wales in 462, but if he visited Illtyd it must have been several years later. Arthur, Illtyd's cousin, is supposed to have fallen in 537. Germanus, his master, died in 474. His pupil Gildas deceased in 570; Paul in or about 567; Samson about 565. There is no mention in the Life of S. Illtyd of the Yellow Plague which broke out in 547, but the deaths so quickly following each other of Isan and Athoclus may possibly have been due to that.

There is a Welsh tradition that Illtyd died in Breconshire, where is the Bedd Gwyl Illtyd.

At Llantwit is the very interesting inscribed stone of Illtyd, erected by one Samson, the King, and covered with beautiful Celtic interlaced work. The inscription on it runs: + ILTUTI : SAMSON REGIS : SAMUEL + EBISAR + ; and on the reverse: + SAMSON POSUIT HANC CRUCEM + PRO ANIMIA EIUS +.¹ It belongs to a period a century or two later than Illtyd.

The memory of Illtyd is honoured by the Welsh on account of his having introduced among them an improved method of ploughing. Before his time they were accustomed to cultivate the ground with the mattock and the over-treading plough (aradr arsang), implements which the compiler of a Triad² upon husbandry observes were still in use among the Irish. In another Triad³ he is said to have been one of "the three Knights of the Court of Arthur who kept the Great" (the Holy Grail), the other two being S. Cadoc and Peredur.

Mr. Ernest Rhys, in an article entitled, "A Knight of the Sangreal,"⁴ observes: "S. David's not excepted, I know of no village or town that has quite as individual an air of antiquity under antiquity as Llantwit Major still wears. You cannot turn anywhere but some decorative angle of a wall, or half-obliterated foundation, or garden returned to nature and wildness, offers you the clue that you would give your whole bookshelf of antiquity to be able to take. However, it is still your romance-books that must help you to disinter this Pompeii of the Saints and the original knights-errant. Their distinctive scenery, their interest of place, their succession of hermit-cwm, forest waste, and miraculous seaside bringing strange vessels to land, recur at every step through the confines of the ancient demesne of Illtyd. If you leave the point in the graveyard, near the old cross, where his wheel-cross stood, and climb the bank above the Hodnant

¹ For the inscribed and sculptured stones at Llantwit, see Mr. Romilly Allen's paper in Arch. Camb., 1889, pp. 118-26, and Sir J. Rhys's, ibid., 1899, pp. 147-55 (both illustrated).

² Myv. Arch., p. 406.

³ Ibid., p. 411.

⁴ Nineteenth Century and After, Jan., 1904, pp. 90-7.

to the old gatehouse, and the columbarium, you cross a grass meadow then, which is full of buried traces of the grange and outer walls and buildings of his mediaeval successors. Then you can cross it to the traditional road through Collugh to the sea, where the brook flows out through the smooth pastures haunted by the sea-mews and so often fondly described by the old poets and romancers, to a sea-coast, wild and rarely rock-built, and pierced with innumerable caverns. There is the very seaside of the Grail histories. . . . If you look behind the histories of the Sangreal you find a scenery very like that of the Llantwit region, and a disappearing figure of a knight very like that of 'Illtyd Farchog.'"

A great number of churches are dedicated to Illtyd in Wales — Llantwit Major (Llanilltyd Fawr), Newcastle, Llanharry, Llantrithyd, Llantrisant (with SS. Gwyno and Tyfodwg), Llantwit Vardre (Llanilltyd Faerdre, formerly one of the five capellæ under Llantrisant), Llantwit-juxta-Neath (Llanilltyd Fach, or Glyn Nedd), under Neath, Oxwich, Ilston (contracted from Iltwitston, formerly called Llanilltyd Gŵyr), all in Glamorganshire; Llanhilleth, in Monmouthshire; Pembrey, in Carmarthenshire; Llantood (the Llantwyd of the Valor of 1535), under S. Dogmael's, in Pembrokeshire; Llanilltyd (otherwise Illtyd), and Llanhamlach (with S. Peter), in Breconshire; and Llanelltyd,¹ in Merionethshire.

A sepulchral slab was discovered in the nave of Oxwich Church in 1891, bearing an inscription which has been read thus: "Hic jacet Hvgo Qvondam Rector Ecce J[ltvti] S[ancti] Pivs"², which confirms the dedication of the Church to S. Illtyd.

Near the Breconshire Llanilltyd Church (situated on Mynydd Illtyd, and originally in the parish of Devynock) is the Bedd Gwyl Illtyd mentioned above. Tradition has it that he lived, died, and was buried in this hamlet. The Bedd is a small tumulus within a much-destroyed rectangular enclosure, near a pool on the mountain. It is said to have received the name, "the Grave of S. Illtyd's Festival," from its having been a custom to watch there formerly on the Vigil of the Saint's day.³

Ty Illtyd (his House) is the name of a well-known cromlech, or chambered cairn, on a hillock on Manest Farm, in the parish of Llanhamlach, about four miles from Brecon. The chamber has been denuded of the cairn which once covered it, exposing the large flat slabs of stone forming the sides and roof.

¹ There can be no doubt as to the dedication of this church to the great Teacher of Saints. Edward Llyyd, in his notes (1699) on the parish, says, "Of Elltyd they have no more to say than that he was Elldyd Farchog." The parish-name is spelt "Llanviltvd" and "Llaunvldit" in the Record of Caernarvon, pp. 200, 277, and "Llanilltid" on the chalice (1591-2).

² Davies (J. D.), West Gower, pt. iv (1894), pp. 130-1 (sketched).

³ Jones (Theo.), Breconshire, ed. 1898, p. 501; Arch. Camb., 1853, p. 326.

It received its appellation from a popular idea that the saint had made it his hermitage. There are several small incised crosses carved on the slabs.¹ There formerly stood within a few paces of it a stone called Maen Illtyd, and a little distance off is Ffynnon Illtyd, the stream of which divides the parish from Llansantffraid. At Llanwonno, in Glamorganshire, is another Ffynnon Illtyd. S. Illtyd's Well at Llandridian, in Gower (apparently Llanrhidian), is said to have given forth a copious stream of milk in 1185.²

There is a poem extant written in his honour by Lewys Morganwg³ (flor. c. 1460–1520). It is for the most part a versification of the Latin Life. Of his life on the bank of the Hodnant it says:—

The fasting and penance of his faith
Would he, bare-headed, daily undergo;
And each night, in a cold spring,
Would he remain naked a whole hour.

He cultivated his own land, and the sea once overflowed it; but—

The sea did he so manfully,
With his staff, compel to retreat,
That the tide would not ascend the Dawon
Where his staff had been placed.

The Meirchiaunus, or Meirchion (i.e., Marcianus) of the Vita is here called Marsianws, according to the later pronunciation.

One of the "Sayings of the Wise" triplets runs⁴:—

Hast thou heard the saying of Illtyd,
The studious, golden torqued knight,
"Whoso doeth evil, evil betide him."
(A wnel ddrwg drwg a'i dylud).

In Cornwall there are but faint traces of Illtyd. A chapel dedicated to him formerly existed at S. Dominick.⁵

¹ Westwood, Lapidarium Walliæ, p. 67; Arch. Camb., 1867, pp. 347–55 (illustrated in both); ibid., 1903, p. 173; Jones (Theo.), ut supra, p. 452. Giraldus Cambrensis, Itin. Camb., i, c. 2, records the tradition that Illtyd "led the life of a hermit" here. With the name Ty Illtyd compare the Breton dolmen-name, Ty Sant Heleau, "S. Teilo's House," at Landeleau, in Finistère.

² Annales de Margan in Annales Monastici, Rolls, 1864, i, p. 18. There is a "S. Illtyd's Brook" somewhere near Neath; Birch, Neath Abbey, p. 250.

³ Printed in Iolo MSS., pp. 292–5. The MS. from which it was taken is Llanover MS. B. 1 (c. 1670), where it occurs at ff. 60a–61b. There is a copy also in Llanstephan MS. 47 (c. 1630).

⁴ Iolo MSS., p. 252.

⁵ Oliver, Monasticon Dioc. Ex., p. 438.

S. ILLTYD.

Statue at Locildut, Sizun.

In Brittany he is patron of Landebaeron, in Côtes-du-Nord, where a portion of his skull is preserved; of Coadout, and Trogueris, and S. Ideuc; and in Finistère of Lanildut. He has also chapels at Loc-Ildut, in Sizun, and he is honoured in the Lande of Plouguiel. There is a fifteenth century statue of him at Loc-Ildut. At Coadout is a dolmen, destroyed in 1863, except for three stones, one of which is much polished. On this, according to local tradition, S. Illtyd and S. Brioc were wont to meet and pray together, and it contains hollows supposed to have been worn by his knees. To him is also dedicated S. Ideuc, Ille-et-Vilaine.¹

The day on which Illtyd died was November 6. His festival, strange to say, occurs in but few Welsh calendars. It is in those in Cotton. Vesp. A. xiv, and Allwydd Paradwys (1670) and in Nicolas Roscarrock, on November 6. Whytford, on the same day, has, "In England y^e feest of Saynt Yltute, cosyn vnto Kyng Arthur & a seculer knyght, that forsoke all y^e worldly pompe & was a religyous man, of hygh perfeccyon & many myracles." In the fifteenth century MS. Missal of Tréguier and the Breviary of Léon, 1516, on November 7; but in the Quimper Breviary of 1835 on November 6. In the Léon Breviary 1736, on November 14; and in an unofficial Heures Bretonnes, of the sixteenth century, on November 6. Browne Willis² gives the same day for his festival at Llanelltyd, Merionethshire. Edward Lhuyd, however, says that they kept their Gwyl Mabsant there on S. Stephen's Day.

The dates in the Life of S. Illtyd can only be fixed conjecturally.

He was born about the year	450
He became disciple of Germanus of Armorica about	460
Left him when Germanus returned to Britain	circa 462
Became a knight and married	" 472
Was converted by S. Cadoc and founded Llantwit	" 476
Retired to the banks of the Ewenny, and Samson made abbot provisionally	521
Returned to Llantwit and Samson left	523
Died aged between 77 and 87	527-537

S. Illtyd is invoked in the Celtic Calendar of the tenth century in the Library of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury.³

¹ De Corson, Pouillé de Rennes, vi, p. 80. In eleventh and twelfth centuries, Eccl. Sti. Idoci.

² Survey of Bangor, 1721, p. 277.

³ Revue Celtique, 1888, p. 88.

S. INA

It is usual to regard the church of Llanina, in Cardiganshire, as dedicated to the famous warrior, legislator, and ecclesiastical benefactor, Ina, Ine, or Ini, King of the West Saxons, who died at Rome about 727, but apart from his fame we can find no ground for its dedication to him. Indeed, there is an antecedent improbability in a Saxon King's having a dedication in so purely Welsh a district.

According to the Progenies Keredic in Cotton. MS. Vesp. A xiv, Ceredig ab Cunedda Wledig had a daughter named Ina. Her name, it is true, does not occur in the genealogies of the Welsh Saints, but she belonged to a great saintly tribe, and her father was allotted Ceredigion, in which Llanina is situated, on the conquest of Wales by the sons of Cunedda. It is more than probable that the church is dedicated to her.

In the Demetian Calendar (S) February 1 is entered as the festival of Ina Farchog, or the Knight, and Browne Willis¹ gives the same day for the parish feast at Llanina. The West Saxon King, however, is commemorated on February 6; but his reputation, no doubt, accounts for the appellation.

"Offeringes in the name of devoc'on" were made to S. Ina at Llanina Church in the latter part of the sixteenth century.² In the sea, not far from the church, is a rock called Carreg or Craig Ina.

The name Ina is rather rare, but we have it in Llwyn Ina, Ina's Forest, which is mentioned in a Glamorgan grant in the Book of Llan Dâu,³ and in Gwaun Ina, Ina's Meadow, in the parish of Llangwyfan, Denbighshire.

S. INDRACT, Martyr

THE story as given by William of Malmesbury is to this effect:—Indract was the son of an Irish King, and he, with his sister Dominica, and nine companions, started on a pilgrimage across the sea. They got as far as the mouth of the Tamar, where they settled, and lived together for some time in prayer and strictness of life. Indract planted his staff in the ground, and it took root, and became a mighty oak.

¹ Parochiale Anglic., 1733, p. 194. So also Meyrick in his Cardiganshire, 1808, p. 46.

² Harleian MS. 6998, fo. 19.

³ P. 258. On p. 127 Ina occurs as the name of a layman.

He also made a pond, from which he daily drew fish, probably salmon, for his little community.

One day he discovered that a member of his society had privily carried off a fish for his private consumption, in addition to the regular meals. After this the supply failed, and Indract deemed it advisable to leave. What apparently took place was a quarrel among the members over the weir in the Tamar, which grew so hot that the congregation separated into factions, and one under Indract left. He went on to Rome, visited the tombs of the apostles, and then retraced his steps, and in course of time reached the neighbourhood of Glastonbury.

The little party lodged at Shapwick, when one of the officials of King Ina, named Horsa, supposing that the pilgrims had money, fell on them by night, murdered the entire party, and carried off whatever he could lay hands on.

King Ina at the time had his court at "Pedrot." Being unable to sleep during the night, he went forth, and saw a column of light standing over Shapwick. Probably Horsa had set fire to the cottage of wattles in which were his victims.

Next day Ina heard of the tragedy and ordered the removal of the bodies to Glastonbury, which he was refounding. Whether the murderer was punished we are not told. According to this legend the event took place about 710.

There are difficulties in the story. How could the early part of the history of the slaughtered men become known, as all had been massacred? No such a person as Indract, son of a King in Ireland, is known in Irish history. The name is, however, found as that of the twenty-first abbot of Iona, who was in office in 849, in which year he transported the relics of S. Columba to Ireland.¹ The Annals of Ulster state that he was killed by the Saxons on March 12, 854.² We are not informed where he was slain, and it is probable that this is the Indract of William of Malmesbury's legend. Nothing more likely than that after having been abbot for a while, the desire came on him to visit the holy sites, and that for this purpose he traversed Wessex, and halted in Cornwall, where the British tongue was spoken. The massacre cannot have been complete; some of the pilgrims must have escaped, and the matter was brought to the ears, not of Ina, but of Ethelwulf, the father of Alfred the Great.

¹ Reeves, S. Columba, Edinburgh, 1874.

² Annals of the Four Masters in 852; Annals of Inisfallen, 840. The Irish form of the name is Indrechtach Hy Finachtain. It is thought that he was at one time Abbot of Londonderry.

That Indract did visit Cornwall is shown by the church of Landrake bearing his name (Lan Indract), and by the existence of his chapel and holy well at Halton, in his sister's foundation, S. Dominick on the Tamar. Some fragments of the chapel remain with fine ilex trees by it, conceivably scions of that tree which William of Malmesbury tells us existed in his day, and was held to have originated out of the staff of the saint. The Holy Well is in good order, and, though possessing no architectural beauty, is picturesquely situated under a large cherry tree. The water is of excellent quality and is unfailing. Water for baptisms in S. Dominick is drawn from this well, although situated at a considerable distance from the parish church.

Dr. Oliver gives the chapel as dedicated to S. Ilduict.¹ This is one of his many blunders. The MS. of Bishop Stafford's Register, from which he drew his information, gives the chapel as that "Sancti Ildracti." Ildract is, of course, Indract (March 6, 1418-9), but in this entry the mistake is made by the Registrar of making the Saint a Confessor instead of a Martyr.

Landrake in Bishop Stapeldon's Register, 1327, is Lanracke. In Domesday it is Riccan. It is now popularly called Larrick. The church is supposed to be dedicated to S. Peter, and the village feast is held on June 29, S. Peter's day. The name, however, and the situation, near S. Dominick, favour the idea that it was a foundation of S. Indract.

The day of SS. Indract and Dominica, according to Whytford and Wilson, is May 8. William of Worcester² says, "Sanctus Indractus martir et confessor die 8 Maii, jacet apud Shepton per 5 miliaria de Glastynbery cum sociis suis centum martiribus."

The Bollandists give February 5, on the worthless authority of Challoner. But May 8 is the day in the Altemps thirteenth century Martyrology, and in the fifteenth century Norwich Martyrology (Cotton. MS. Julius B vii), and in Capgrave.

In Art, Indract should be figured as a pilgrim with a salmon in his hand, and a staff that is putting forth oak leaves.

S. IOUGUIL, or IOUIL, see S. LLYWEL

S. ISAN, Abbot, Confessor

THE parentage of this Saint is not known. In the *Iolo MSS.*³ he is said to have been a Saint or monk of Bangor Illtyd, i.e., Llantwit.

¹ Monasticon Exon., p. 438.

² Itin., p. 150.

³ P. 107.

The Faces of D. O. p. 5^a has Lander followed by Richan.

He is very probably the abbot Isanus, who, with another abbot, paid a visit to S. Illtyd just before his death.¹ See under S. ILLTYD.

Isan is believed to be the patron of Llanisen or Llanishen, in Glamorganshire. A church of the same name in Monmouthshire is also probably dedicated to him. It is given in the *Book of Llan Dâw*² as Lann Yssan, and also as Lann Nissien. The Norman ecclesiastics read into the name that of Dionysius or Denis. In a Tintern charter the Monmouthshire church occurs as "the Church of Dionysius of Lanissan"; whilst the Glamorgan one is probably the "Capella de Sancti Dionysii" (sic) of the Tewkesbury charter of 1180. It is said that there are remains of a Capel Denis in the latter parish, which may mark an earlier site of the church.³ Browne Willis gives both churches as dedicated to S. Denis,⁴ but he does not assign a festival day. Most probably the Apostle and Patron of France, on October 9, is intended.

A Lann Issan or Yssan, in the Hundred of Roose, Pembrokeshire, was claimed by the Bishops of Llandaff as belonging to that see.⁵ This church, however, is identified with S. Ishmael's.

Isan's festival is not entered in the Welsh calendars. Abbot Isan died on December 16.

Handwritten note:
 above is on hill over of ...

S. ISHO, or ISSUI, Martyr

THIS saint is the patron of Patrishow or Patricio, subject to Llanbedr Ystradyw, in Breconshire. The earliest form under which the church name occurs is Merthir Issiu, in the twelfth century Book of Llan Dâw,⁶ which records its consecration by Bishop Herewald (1056-1103); but in more recent times it was called Pertrissw (Peniarth MS. 147), Partrisw (Myv. Arch.), and Llanysho (1555), among other forms. The remote, curious little church, with its three stone altars, is of very great ecclesiological interest.⁷

¹ Vita 2da S. Samsonis, ed. Plaine, c. 18; Mabillon, Acta SS. (O.S.B.), i, p. 168.

² Pp. 241-2, 321. The name, with the honorific prefix to or ty, seems to be the Tynysan or Tanasan of the same work (see index, p. 420). The Mabinogi of Branwen mentions Nissien and Efnissien, the two half-brothers of Brân Fendigaid.

³ Green, Churches of Llandaff, Aberdare, 1907, pp. 52, 150-1; Cardiff Records, v, pp. 368, 523.

⁴ Paroch. Anglic., p. 206; Llandaff, append., p. 2.

⁵ Book of Llan Dâw, pp. 56, 62, 124, 255, 287. ⁶ P. 279.

⁷ It has been described and illustrated in Arch. Camb. for 1902, pp. 98-102, and 1904, pp. 49-64; also in "A Short Account of the Church of Ishow the Martyr," 1907, by Mr. R. Baker-Gabb.

There can be very little doubt, we think, that the first part of the parish-name stands for Merthyr, but the change of initial m to p in Welsh is very unusual.¹ As for the Saint's name, the Book of Llan Dâv spelling, Issiu, must be for Issui, which would naturally become Isswy, Isso, and Isho. Common spellings of the name are Ishow and Ishaw, but more correctly it should be Isho.

There is no record whatever as to Isho's parentage; and the only name that suggests itself to us for a possible equation is that of Yse; whom William of Worcester and Leland² give as one of the children of Brychan, and by whom is evidently intended the patron of S. Issey, Mevagissey (i.e. SS. Meva and Issey), in Cornwall. But the early Episcopal Registers give Ida or Itha, an Irish saint, as patroness of S. Issey, which name seems to be a corruption of S. Itha. See under that Saint's name.

The little that is known of Isho is derived from the local tradition, which we give in the words of Theophilus Jones, the historian of the county: ³ "It is stated that he was a holy man, who led a religious life in this retired spot and his little oratory upon the bank of a small rivulet called Nant Mair, or Mary's Brook, which runs at the bottom of the hill on which the church is built; that having long lived in high estimation among the natives, whom he instructed in the principles of Christianity, he was at length murdered by an ungrateful traveller who had been hospitably received and entertained by him in his humble cell. A small cavity scooped out in the side of a bank, and walled with stone, but open in front, is still pointed out as the chapel, or as others say, the well of Saint Ishaw; if either, it was the latter, as the space is by no means calculated for the offices of a chapel, and besides in the back, close to the ground, is an aperture evidently intended for the admission of water. In the walls are several small niches, formed, apparently, for the reception of oblations from pious votaries."

Richard Fenton, who visited Patrishow in 1804, wrote in his diary: ⁴ "Below the church saw the sainted well of Ishaw, being a very scanty

¹ A converse instance occurs to us in Postyn, the old form of the name of a township of Llansannan, which has been altered, by false analogy, to Mostyn. The interchange of m and b in Welsh is, however, quite common; maban—baban, menyw—benyw, etc. Possibly Merth'risho first became Bartrisho, and the B was afterwards protracted, as in Potfari for Bodfari, etc.

² See i, pp. 318–9. M. J. Loth, in Revue Celtique, xxix. (1908), p. 307, suggests that Issiu may have been the same as the Breton Saint Igeau of Pligeau, which is very improbable. Browne Willis's dedicaton of the church to S. Patricius (Paroch. Anglic., p. 181) is, of course, a mere guess.

³ Breconshire, ed. 1898, p. 377. The first edition of this work appeared in three parts in 1805–9.

⁴ Theophilus Jones: his Life, etc., ed. Edwin Davies, Brecon, 1905, p. 145.

oozing of water, to which, however, was formerly attributed great virtue, as within the building that encloses it there are little niches to hold the vessels drank out of and the offerings they left behind." It is a little rectangular well, walled in on three sides, and arched over.

Willis, as quoted by Theophilus Jones, says that the festival day of Isho was October 30, and this is the day Rees gives.¹

S. ISMAEL, Bishop, Confessor

ACCORDING to the Life of S. Oudoceus² Ismael was the son of Budic or Buddig, the son of Cybrdan, of Cornugallia or Cornouaille. Budic was forced by some dynastic revolution to quit his native country, and he "came with his fleet to the region of Dyfed in the time of Aircol Lawhir, who was King thereof." He was hospitably received, and making his abode in Dyfed, he married Anauved, daughter of Ensic or Usyllt ab Hydwn Dwn (the father also of S. Teilo) by Guenhaf, daughter of Livonui. The children by the marriage were SS. Ismael, Tyfei, and Oudoceus (Euddogwy).

After some years had elapsed ambassadors came to Budic from Cornouaille announcing the death of the king, and that the people, wishing to elect a successor of "the royal progeny," had in council made choice of him, and were desirous that he should immediately undertake the government. The proposal was accepted, and Budic, taking with him his wife and family, returned to his native land, and established his dominion over the whole of Armorica, "which in his time extended as far as the Alps."

Ismael has nothing to do with the Jewish name Ishmael. It is a fossilized Old-Welsh form, and would now have been Ysfael, which actually occurs as the name of a stream in Llanddarog, near Carmarthen. It is found in a still older form as Osmail, the name of one of the sons of Cunedda Wledig, which appears in the Life of S. Carannog³ as Ismael.

Ismael and his brothers returned to Wales. He is mentioned in the Life of S. David⁴ as a disciple of that Saint, and was with him in Hodnant, founding his monastery, when he was encountered by Boia.

¹ Welsh Saints, p. 308.

² Book of Llan Dáv, p. 130. For other Ismael names, see its index, p. 406. The Welsh pedigrees know nothing of Ismael.

³ Cambro-British Saints, p. 101; Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, p. 296.

⁴ Cambro-British Saints, p. 124; Giraldus, Opera, iii, p. 387.

From the Life of S. Teilo ¹ we also learn that the three brothers were disciples of Dubricius, and subsequently of Teilo. On the decease of David, Teilo consecrated his nephew bishop, and "sent him to take charge of the church of Menevia."

All the churches dedicated to S. Ismael are situated in Pembrokeshire, with the exception of Llanishmael or S. Ishmael's, near Kidwelly, in Carmarthenshire. In Pembrokeshire there are Camrose, Rosemarket, S. Ishmael's in Roose (under Hasguard), and Uzmaston. To him is also very probably dedicated Haroldston S. Issel's (or East) in the same country. The S. Issel's here stands apparently for S. Ismel's. The Issel, patron of S. Issell's near Tenby (called in Welsh Llan or Eglwys Usyllt), is, however, Usyllt, the father of S. Teilo.²

S. Ishmael's in Roose was formerly known in Welsh as Llan (or Eglwys) Ysmael. As Eglwys Ysmael it is given as one of "the Seven Bishop's Houses in Dyfed;" and it is laid down that "the abbot of Ysmael should be graduated in literary degrees."³ In the Book of Llan Dâv ⁴ Lann Yssan or Issan occurs among the possessions of the Bishops of Llandaff in Roose. There can be no doubt that by it is meant S. Ishmael's. With Isan and Ismael may be compared the fuller forms of the names of SS. Cadoc and Brioc.

The festival of S. Ismael, June 16, seems to occur only in the Calendar in Cotton. MS. Vesp. A. xiv. Browne Willis ⁵ gives June 25 as his festival day at Uzmaston.

S. ISSEL, see S. USYLLT

S. ITHA, or ITA, Virgin, Abbess

THIS very remarkable woman was the Brigid of Munster, and the spread of her cult in Devon and Cornwall shows that there must have been communities of women in ancient Dumnonia under her rule, and affiliated to the mother-house at Killeedy. This leads to the surmise that a migration of the Hy Connail may have led to a settlement

¹ Book of Llan Dâv, p. 115.

² Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, pp. 307-8.

³ Aneurin Owen, Welsh Laws, Rolls, 1841 (folio), p. 273. On p. 794 it is "Lan Yssan in Ros." Cf. the Record of Caernarvon, p. 189, "Sci Ismahelis". Giraldus, Itin. Camb., i, c. 11, speaks of S. Caradog's religious life "apud Sanctum Hysmaelem in Rosensi provincia."

⁴ Pp. 56, 62, 124, 255.

⁵ Paroch. Anglic., 1733, p. 177.

in these parts, a surmise strengthened by the fact of inscribed stones bearing Kerry names being found in Devon.

According to William of Worcester, the body of S. Ida lay at S. Issey, and he adds that she was a martyr. It is probable that this fifteenth century writer made hasty notes only during his flying visit to Cornwall, and that he fell into an error through carelessness in calling her a martyr. That presumed relics of S. Issey may have been shown at S. Issey is probable enough, but it is not probable that they were genuine.

In the Monasticon Dr. Oliver was guilty of a mistake. He misread, or misunderstood, Bishop Stafford's entry relative to Eglosruc, or S. Issey, and supposed that it referred to Egloskerry, and accordingly made SS. Ida and Lidy patronesses of the latter church, and, further, blundered in making S. Filius patron of S. Issey, in place of Philleigh, which was anciently Eglosros. He has been followed by Mr. Copeland Borlase, who had not the means of discovering the errors. These have been pointed out by Prebendary Hingeston-Randolph in his edition of Bishop Stafford's Register, p. 316. In Bishop Bronescombe's Register for 1259 (p. 250), S. Issey is indicated as dedicated to S. Ida. In Bishop Grandisson's Register the church is "Sancte Ide," 1330, 1334, 1354; "Sta Ida," 1362. The church when visited by the Bishop in 1331 possessed an "Antiphonarium, cum Legenda;" also "Legenda Sanctorum competens præterquam in principio, quod est corruptum." Ecton in his Thesaurus gives S. Esye als. Issye als. Ithy als. Eglescrook.

Ida is the Latin form of Itha. Itha became corrupted into Ithey, and then into Issey. The Manor, however, retained the title unchanged as S. Ide, and extended through a part of the parish and also into those of Little Petherick, S. Ervan, S. Breock, Padstow, and Mawgan. Near the church of Little Petherick, in Lysons' time, were the ruins of a chapel of S. Ida.

S. Teath, pronounced S. Teth, is another corruption of S. Itha.

MS. Lives of S. Ita exist in the Bodleian Library, Rawlins, B. 505, pp. 164-70; and in the so-called Codex Kilkenniensis in Bishop Marsh's Library, Dublin, foll. 110-3. Colgan has published a Life in Acta SS. Hibern., Vita S. Itæ sive Midæ, Jan. 16, and this has been reproduced in the Acta SS. Boll., i. pp. 1062-8. She is mentioned in the Life of S. Brendan of Clonfert, and in that of S. Aidan or Moedoc, etc.

Itha was a daughter of the royal house of the Deisi, who had been expelled from Meath in the third century by Cormac Mac Airt, and obliged to find new homes. One portion of the tribe, under Eochaid, crossed into South Wales and settled there, but another migrated to the South of Ireland and occupied the present county of Waterford.

Itha was the child of Cenfoelad Mac Cormac, and of Necht, and was lineally descended from Conn of the Hundred Battles, King of Ireland 123-57.

Her birth took place about 480, and as her parents were Christians, she was baptised, and given the name of Dairdre, which was Latinized into Dorothea. She acquired the nick-name of Ith later, on account of her "thirst" for the living water of heavenly truth.

She had two sisters whose names have been preserved: Necht, who married Beoan, and became the mother of S. Mochoemog or Pulcherius; and Fina, who is numbered among the Saints. In the Life of S. Fintan of Dunbleisc (Doone in Limerick) we are told that his mother's sister was S. Fina, but his mother and Fina are said to have been daughters of Artgail.

From an early age Itha had made up her mind to embrace the monastic life. This was not at all in accordance with her father's purpose, who had made arrangements for her marriage. When Itha learned his intentions, she refused food, and "fasted against" her own father, who was by this means compelled to give way.¹

She then received the veil at some church not specified, in the present county of Waterford, and departed into the territory of the Hy Luachra or Hy Connaill, that is to say, into the present county of Limerick, where she settled under the slopes of the Mullaghareick chain, at a place called Cluain-Credhail, that is now known as Killeedy, or the Cell of Ida. She had several devout women as companions, and there she formed a college.

The Life passes abruptly from the early days of Itha, and her taking the veil, to when she is an Abbess at Killeedy, but from an incident that occurs in the narrative we conclude that for a while she had been under the Abbess Cainreach at Clonburren, in Roscommon. The incident is as follows:—

One day Aengus, Abbot of Clonmacnois, sent a priest to celebrate the Eucharist and communicate the congregation of S. Itha. Afterwards the holy woman bade her disciples fold up and pack the vestments in which the priest had celebrated, and send them with his baggage as a present to Clonmacnois. The priest demurred; he had been instructed by his Abbot to receive nothing in return for the service rendered. Then Itha quieted his scruples by saying, "Long ago, your Abbot Aengus visited the convent of the holy virgin Chinreach. I was there at the time. Chinreach washed the feet of Aengus, and wiped them with a towel. I at the time was by, kneeling and holding part of the towel, and I helped to dry his feet. Tell him that. He will be pleased, and not reject the little present now offered with all my heart." This is the sole intimation that we have of Itha having passed any time with S. Cainreach of Clonburren, who is meant by Chinreach.¹

¹ Colgan, Acta SS. Hibern., Vita S. Ita, c. iv, p. 66.

The district occupied by the Hy Connaill Gabhra, among whom Itha made her abode, comprised the baronies of Conello and Glenquin. She must have been invited thither, as the chief of the clan at once gave her lands, and would have granted her more, but she refused to receive them. She needed sufficient to maintain her establishment in necessities but not in wealth. The Hy Connaill chose her to be their tribal Saint, to bless their undertakings, and to curse their enemies, as well as to undertake the education of their daughters.

To impress the imaginations of the rude natives, she had recourse to great austerities, and acquired the repute of being able to perform miracles, and to have the gift of prophecy.

Among those who lived with her was her sister Necht. Itha had engaged a skilful carpenter, Beoan, to construct a church for her, and she soon perceived that a flirtation was in progress between the artificer and Necht. Like a sensible woman, she at once favoured the mutual attachment, having satisfied herself that her sister had no vocation for the monastic life, and she saw that they were married respectably.²

Itha was resolved not to yield to the temptation of making the community wealthy, and she constantly refused presents made to it. One day when a rich man pressed gold into her hands, she rejected it, and sent for water wherewith to wash off the soil of filthy lucre. "What ought I to do with the money?" asked the man. "Use it aright," was her reply. "Gold may help you to make a display, or, on the other hand, to relieve distress."³

She maintained an affectionate regard for S. Erc, who placed the little Brendan with her to be nursed, till he was five or six years old. Brendan remained warmly attached to his foster-mother, and consulted her in his difficulties. One day, when she was an old woman and he in vigorous manhood, he asked her what three things, in her opinion, were most pleasing to God. She promptly replied, "Resignation to the Divine will, simplicity, and largeheartedness." "And what," asked Brendan further, "is most hateful to God?" "Churlishness, a love of evil, and greed after gain," was her reply.⁴

There was another community of religious women at no great

¹ Colgan, Acta SS. Hibern., Vita S. Itæ, c. xvii.

² Ibid., c. xv. Their child was S. Mochoemog or Pulcherius.

³ Ibid., c. xviii.

⁴ Ibid., c. xix.

distance. This society was thrown into confusion by the fact of a theft having taken place among the maidens, and suspicion rested on one of them, who steadfastly protested her innocence. The superior, unable to get at the bottom of the mystery, proposed that all should go to Killeedy and visit S. Itha. This they accordingly did, and on arriving kissed the saint, with the exception of the girl who was accused of the theft, and who shyly held back. Itha fixed her eyes intently on her and said "Kiss me, my child, your face proclaims your innocence." She then privately informed the superior that her suspicions rested on a bold, pert girl, who had already got into trouble about some other matter. On investigation, the stolen article was found in the possession of her whom Itha had indicated.¹

A widow named Rethna lived somewhere in the plain of the Liffey, near Kildare. She had a daughter in a condition of chronic ill-health. She consulted her foster-son, S. Colman of Oughval, and both agreed to ask Itha to cure the girl. On their arrival at Killeedy, Itha was not a little embarrassed by the petition. She, however, extricated herself from the difficulty with dexterity. She replied that, certainly, she could heal the patient, if desired, but informed the mother that the damnation of her daughter was assured, were she restored to robust health, whereas the girl was certain to inherit heaven if she continued infirm. The choice was left to Rethna, who could hardly do other than accept eternal blessedness with its concomitant disadvantage in this life. By this means Itha was released from the risk of attempting, and failing in the attempt, to work a miracle.

One of her community deserted and wandered about the country, and finally became servant to a Druid in Connaught. Itha did not forget the girl; she continued to be anxious about her, and induced S. Brendan to find out where she was, and then to induce the King of Connaught to effect her liberation. This he did, and she received back with compassion the runaway, together with a child she had borne.² It was by her advice that Brendan took ship and sailed in quest of the Isles of the Blessed, and probably discovered Madeira and the Canaries; and it was she who recommended him, when about to undertake a second voyage, to abandon the use of wicker-work boats covered with hides, and to make vessels of oak planks.

Her uncle died in the Nandesii country. She sent for his eight sons, and told them that their father was in Hell, but she would get him out, if they would each for a year give bread and butter or a sandwich and a candle daily to as many poor folk. At the end of a twelvemonth they returned. "He is out to his middle," said

¹ Colgan, Acta SS. Hibern., Vita S. Itæ, c. xxiv.

² Ibid., c. xxxi.

Itha, "go on in the same way another year." They did so and came again. "He is out now wholly," she said, "but stark naked. To clothe him decently you must go on with your alms for a third year."¹

A hymn to the infant Jesus is attributed to her by the Scholiast on the Félire of Oengus. It may be rendered thus:—

Jesuskin, whom I adore,
Nursed by me in little cell,
Clerk may come with richest store,
I have Christ, and all is well.

Nursling rocked by me at home,
Nursling of no vulgar clown,
Jesus with the host of heaven
To my bosom cometh down.

* * * *

Jesuskin of heavenly birth,
Endless good, of Hebrew maid,
Nobler than a Clerk of Earth,
Lowly on my lap is laid.

Sons of Princes, sons of Kings
Though they to my country come,
Not from them make I demands!
Jesus is my rest, my home.

Sing in chorus, damsels pure,
Greatest tribute is his due,
High in heaven his Throne endure,
Though he comes to me and you.²

One day a basket was found suspended to a cross near the convent, and in it was a newly-born babe. It was taken in, baptised and nursed by St. Itha. Afterwards it was discovered that the child was one born to Fiachna, King of West Munster. The origin of the infant was so scandalous that at first it was proposed to kill it, but instead it was committed in the manner aforesaid to the charge of Itha. As it was found in a basket (cummmain), the name given the child was Cummin; he grew up and was educated to the ecclesiastical profession, and is known as S. Cummin the Tall. He was the author of a hymn in honour of the Apostles, included in the Irish Liber Hymnorum.³ The chronology of S. Cummin, however, shows that, although he may have been left at Killeedy as described, it cannot have been during the lifetime of S. Itha.

¹ Colgan, Acta SS. Hibern., Vita S. Ithæ, c. xxx.

² A literal translation in Whitley Stokes' Félire of Oengus, p. xxxv. One verse is obscure, and is omitted above.

³ Liber Hymnorum, ii, p. 9.

The hymn attributed to her served as a basis for the invention of a story that she had prayed, and was given the infant Jesus to nurse on her lap. Similar stories have been told of other Saints, as S. Catherine of Alexandria, S. Frances of Rome, S. Catherine of Bologna, S. Rose of Lima; also of S. Anthony of Padua and S. Nicholas Tolentino. All grew out of a saying of Christ (S. Matt. xxv. 40).

As already said, the clan of Hy Connaill held her in the highest reverence, along with S. Senan. The Vita says "tota gens Huaconaill Sanctam tam n matronem suam hic et in futuro accepit," and, "Sancta Virgo, eandem gentem et terram suam multis benedictionibus benedixit."

When it went to war with another tribe, the Cinraidh Luachra, or the Corca Duibhne, her aid was invoked to curse the enemy. As the campaigns proved successful, her hold on the respect and affections of the clan became doubly secure.

In her old age she was afflicted with cancer.¹ This has been represented by legend as her suffering from a beetle that devoured her sides and grew to the size of a pig. Her last illness was most painful, but was borne with extraordinary patience. Before her death she blessed not her own community only, but also the clergy of the tribe to which she was attached.

She died on January 15, 569 or 570. This is her day in the Martyrologies. In the Salisbury Calendar, on January 15, as "S. Dorothea, also called Sith." Whytford gives her on January 15, as "Saynt Dorythy, that by an other name is called Saynt Syth." Wilson says on January 25, a mistake for January 15, "Eodem die in Cornwallia depositio S. Ithæ, genere Hibernicæ, sanctitatis et miraculis claræ, in qua regione aliquot fana, aliaque monumenta in ejus honorem erecta, extant." In the Christ Church, Dublin, Martyrology, she is entered on May 13, "Eodem die Sanctæ Sithe, Virginis," but these words are added in the margin in a hand of the sixteenth century. In the Calendar prefixed to the Chained Book of the Corporation of Dublin, on this same day, "Sancta Sitha, Virgo." In a MS. Breviary of the fifteenth century in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, on the same day, "Site Virginis ix lect." She is, however, everywhere else set down on January 15.

She is also called Mita, Mida and Mide, a contraction of Mo-Ita, My Ita.

In an Indulgence granted by Bishop Stafford, October 18, 1399, to such as should pray for the soul of the Lady Matilda Chyverston, he speaks of the church of Egloscruc, "Sanctorum Idi et Lidi, Martirorum," a clerical error. In another document, however, in 1400, the vicarage is described as that of "Sancte Ide, alias Egloscruc." But Bishop Brantyngham, April 26, 1382, makes the same blunder, calling the church that "Sanctorum Ide et Lydi de Egloscruc," but in 1383 correctly, "Sanctarum Ide et Lide"; and Bishop Grandisson invariably so, 1330, 1334, 1335, 1362.

¹ The Irish word is Daol. Colgan renders it vermis; Dr. Todd, a cockchafer. There can be little doubt that what is meant is cancer.

S. Itha can be regarded as a martyr only in consideration of her painful final illness.

The question may be raised, how comes it that we have dedications to her, or foundations bearing her name, in Devon and Cornwall? Probably S. Petroc had something to do with this. S. Dagan, who was a disciple of S. Petroc and of S. Pulcherius, was nephew of S. Itha. Petroc, who had been trained in Ireland, when settling in Cornwall, would wish to establish communities for women there, and he would almost certainly send to Ireland for some trained in the great female schools there to undertake a similar work in Dumnonia.

Dedications to S. Itha are:—The parish church of S. Issey. Ecton gives Issye alias Ithy. The parish church of Mevagissey, according to Ecton, is dedicated conjointly to S. Mewan and S. Issey. The parish church of S. Teath. The parish church of Ide, near Exeter. A ruined chapel in Little Petherick. A ruined chapel in Helsborough Camp, Michaelstow, where she is known as S. Sith.

The farm adjoining Gulval is Landithey, so that it would seem probable that this was originally a foundation of S. Itha, but settled in afterwards by S. Wulvella, and the church is now dedicated to her in place of Itha.

S. Issey Feast is on the Sunday nearest to November 20. S. Teath Fairs are on the last Tuesday in February and the first Tuesday in July. Anciently her feast was May 1, says Nicolas Roscarrock.

As S. Tethi or Etich, Virgin, Roscarrock enters her feast as the Saturday after the Epiphany, which comes near to the day of S. Itha in the Irish Martyrologies.

In Art she should be represented in white as an Irish Abbess, with a beetle or crab at her side, or with an angel bearing loaves, as it was fabled that she was fed with bread from heaven.

ITLAW of Pelynt (the current) See June 11

m. 111. 111. 111. 111. 111.

S. IVE of S. Ive's Bay. See S. HIA

S. JAMES, Abbot, Confessor

JAMES, (Jacob, or Jacut,) Gwethenoc, and Winwaloe were all three sons of Fracan, a cousin of Cado, Duke of Cornwall.

Their mother was Gwen of the Three Breasts, who had been previously married to Eneas Lydewig, and by him had become the mother of S. Cadfan.

The story goes that Gwen actually had three breasts, and that the three brothers were born and suckled together. There was a daughter as well, but, as the author of the Life of S. Winwaloe says, "she did not count," and no special breast was provided by nature for her. This nonsense springs out of a misunderstanding. A woman was called three or four breasted, if she had been married more than once, and had reared a family by each husband. This fabulous matter disappears from the Life of SS. James and Gwethenoc, recovered by the Père de Smedt from a MS. in the National Library at Paris (Catalogus Codicum Hagiographicorum Latin., 1889, T. i, pp. 578-82). This begins thus: "Fuit in occiduis Britannici territorii partibus vir quidam opulentus et inter convicaneos suos nominatissimus, Fraganus nomine, habens conjugem coæquibilem, lingua patria Guen appellatam, quod Latine sonat Candida. Quibus divina pietas trium sobolem filiorum largita est, quorum duos gemellos uterus profudit in lucem, tertium vero deinde parturivit, his duobus, juniorem. Gemelli quidam alter Gwethenocus, alter Jacobus, tertius autem appellatus est Wingualoeus."

According to this, the family belonged to the West of Britain and Gwethenoc and James were twins, Winwaloe being born somewhat later. The Life of S. Winwaloe is more explicit. After describing the ravages of the Saxons, and the great plague which devastated Britain (446-7), it goes on to mention the flight of many of the natives to Armorica. "Inter quos autem fuit vir quidam illustris—nomine Fracanus, Catovii (Cadoi) regis Britannici, viri secundum sæculum famosissimi, consobrinus. . . . Cujus etiam prædicti regis erat terra Nominæ (Dumnoniæ)." ¹

Gwen Teirbron was the sister of Amwn Ddu, the father of S. Samson; also of Pedrwn, father of S. Padarn. She was first cousin to S. Illyd. This being so, it is quite impossible that the plague described in the Life of S. Winwaloe should be the Yellow Death, which raged from 547 to 550; but must be that earlier plague spoken of by Gildas, and which swept the island in the fifth century. The writer refers by name to Gildas, and the whole passage is probably taken from him.

¹ Vita Sti. Winwaloei in Cart. Landevenec, Rennes, 1888, c. ii.

For the history of S. James we must refer to what has been already said under S. GWETHENOC. 201 p 209

That the two brothers left Brittany and visited their native Cornwall is probable; for we have a foundation of S. Gwethenoc at Lewannick, and this is near the Winwaloe foundations of Tresmere and Tremaine, and the Jacobstow foundation is not far distant from these latter. Hard by was the great Petherwin district of their cousin S. Padarn, and S. Samson's was at Southill.

At S. Breward were an ancient chapel and a cemetery of S. James. Bones are still found there, and this seems to indicate that it was once an ecclesiastical centre of some importance. A mere chapelry would not have a graveyard around it. L

There were chapels dedicated to S. James at Camborne, at Bollaize in Braddock, at Goldsithney in Perran-uthnoe, but it is not possible, without knowing the date when they were founded, to say whether they are to be attributed to one of the Apostles of the name, or to the brother of S. Winwaloe.

The Calendars of S. Méen and S. Malo give as his day February 8, but the Calendar of the diocese of S. Brieuc gives June 3. The two brothers are, however, sometimes coupled with S. Winwaloe, and commemorated on March 3. Albert le Grand gives February 8, which is no doubt the correct day.

In Brittany he is patron of S. Jacut-du-Mené, S. Jacut-sur-Mer, S. Jacut-sur-Aro.

In Art, James should be represented as an Abbot with a ship in his hand, and a star above his head, to show that he and his brother have inherited the attributes of the Dioscuri. ccu h 201

S. JAOUA or JOEVIN, Bishop, Confessor

THE authority for the Life of this saint, the nephew of Paulus Aurelianus, is the lections of the Breviary of Léon, printed in the Acta SS. Boll., Mart. i, p. 139; also a Life by Albert le Grand based on the same Breviary lessons, and on the MS. collections made by Yves le Grand, in the fifteenth century, and which contained all he could gather relative to the early history of the Church of Léon.

Jaoua was born in Glamorgan, in the cantref of Penychen, and was son of the married sister of S. Paul.

At an early age the boy was sent by his uncle to be educated. After this was complete, he returned to his parents. When, however, he heard that Paul had crossed into Armorica he resolved on following him, and took boat. A furious gale broke on the vessel as it drew towards the west coast of Finistère, and it was driven south, and happily entered the harbour of Brest and ran up the river of Faou. He and his shipmates went on shore at Landevenec, where they were well received by Judoval, the Abbot; and there Jaoua remained as a simple monk till he was ordained priest. Then Judoval sent him to Brasparts, near Pleyben, on the slopes of the Monts d'Arrée, where a good deal of paganism still lingered among the primitive population. At Faou, at the head of the long creek that runs east from the Rade de Brest, lived a chief who did not at all relish the advent of the monks, and although doubtless a British colonist, he was averse to their settling in the land and securing large tracts of land. Hearing, one day, that Jaoua and his abbot Judoval, as well as another abbot, Tadec by name, were to meet at a place now called Daoulas, he went there with some of his armed men, burst in the door of the church, cut down Tadec at the altar, and pursued Judoval and Jaoua as they fled. He caught up the elder, and slew him; but Jaoua had younger legs, and he made good his escape and took refuge at Brasparts.

The Legend relates that a dragon came out of the water and devastated Le Faou; what is probably true is that the indignant monks of Landevenec appealed to Budic, King of Cornouaille, and he threatened the chief with condign punishment, unless he made amends and paid blood-money. He accordingly submitted, and gave up a bit of land where the murders had been committed, and where was then founded the abbey of Daou-Gloas (the Two Murders); and S. Jaoua became first abbot.

However, Jaoua found this no bed of roses; he was so harassed, whether by recalcitrant monks, or by secret opposition from the chief, that he threw up his charge, placing over the community a nephew of the chief, named Tusvean, and went to Léon to his uncle, who at once resigned the bishopric and abbey, and appointed his nephew in his room, that he might retire to the Isle of Batz. Jaoua summoned to him a disciple named Kenan and ordained him priest, and sent him to Ploucerneau.

As the harvest failed at Daoulas, it was at once concluded that this was due to the bad treatment shown to Jaoua, and he was entreated to return and bless the place and remove the ban he was supposed to have cast on it. He consented. On his way back he revisited Brasparts, where he was attacked by fever. However, he was impatient to be back, and pushed on, crossed the range of the Monts d'Arrée and the river Elorn, and died at Plouvien, near Plabennec. He died on March 2, after having been bishop of Léon for a year only.

His body was laid in a tomb, over which a sepulchral monument with his figure on it was raised in 1646, but it is in a pretty, late Flamboyant chapel of 1567. Jaoua died about the year 568.

He is commemorated on March 2, MS. Breviary of Tréguier, fifteenth century; the Breviary of Léon, 1516, 1736; in Les Heures Bretonnes du XV^e Cent.; and Breviaries of Quimper and S. Malo.

S. JARMEN, see S. FEBRIC

S. JUDNOU, Abbot, Confessor

JUDNOU was a disciple of S. Dubricius,¹ and was abbot of Bolgros.² This is supposed to occupy a site on Belli-moor, in Madley, Herefordshire, the native place of Dubricius in Ynys Efrddyl. It must have been devastated by the Saxons and never restored.

S. JULITTA, Widow

THE Saint Julitta of Tarsus, and her son Cyriacus, have assumed undue prominence in Cornwall. Julitta of Tarsus has displaced local saints. Those whom she has supplanted are:—(1) Ilud, daughter of Brychan; (2) Julitta, mother of S. Paternus; and (3) Jutwara or Aude.

1. S. Juliot of North Cornwall is probably Ilud, given in the Cognatio as one of the unmarried daughters of Brychan, and whom Leland renders Juliana. Ilud is the Welsh form of Julitta. The feast at S. Juliot's is on the nearest Sunday to June 29.

2. The mother of S. Paternus of Avranches was named Julitta. The mother of S. Paternus or Padarn, of Llanbadarn Fawr, was named Gwen. But the legends of the two saints got intermixed, and Padarn was identified not only with Paternus of Avranches, but also with Paternus of Vannes. Then the name of Julitta was taken over in place of Gwen as that of the mother of Padarn.¹

¹ Book of Llan D.v., p. 80.

² Ibid., pp. 164, 166.

The mother of Padarn was married to Pedrwn, son of Emyr Llydaw.

In consequence of a family revolution, Pedrwn and several of his brothers were obliged to fly to Britain from Armorica, and Pedrwn went on to Ireland, where he embraced the monastic life.

Gwen-Julitta was left in Armorica with her infant son. One day she had laid in the window the cloth, out of which she purposed fashioning a garment for her boy, when an eagle swooped down, carried it off, and employed it as a lining for his nest. At the end of a twelve-month, the cloth was recovered, practically uninjured, and was put to the use for which originally intended.

Forty years passed. One day Padarn asked his mother why he so often saw tears in her eyes, and when she told him that her heart ached to see her husband again, he resolved on going in quest of his father. He departed to Britain, and then crossed into Ireland, where he discovered Pedrwn, but was unable to induce him to go back to his wife.

It is possible—we can hardly venture to say more—that some of the Julitta foundations in Cornwall may have been originally stations of the mother of S. Padarn. He is likely to have provided for his mother's comforts; and it was in accordance with Celtic usage for a Saint to plant his mother near him to form a monastic school for girls.

The chapel at Tintagel, now in ruins, but still with its altar, is said by Leland to have been dedicated to S. Ulitte, or Uliane. In Wales, the churches of S. Curig have been transferred to S. Cyriacus, and this boy-saint has carried with him the name of his mother Julitta, as they are rarely culted apart.

For the Julitta dedications in Wales see under S. CURIG.

S. JULIUS, Martyr, see S. AARON

S. JUNABUI or JUNAPEIUS, Abbot, Confessor

HE was one of the disciples of S. Dubricius, and was his cousin (consobrinus).²

¹ Albert Le Grand makes the mother of S. Paternus of Vannes to be Gwen-Julitta.

² Book of Llan Dâu, pp. 72, 80. His name is written also Junapius, Lunapeius, and Hunapui. For the element -pui, see under S. GWENABWY.

He founded a church at Lann Loudeu, now Llanlousy, in Herefordshire. The grant was made by Gurcant, son of Cinuin, King of Erging.¹ Another foundation was Lann Budgualan, now Ballingham, on the bank of the Wye. The grant was also by Gurcant, "sedens super sepulchrum patris sui et pro anima illius."² Presumably it was originally dedicated to S. Budgualan, but now to S. Dubricius. His main foundation, however, would seem to have been Lann Junabui, which has been identified with Bredwardine,³ but it might well be Llandinabo, assuming that the present church, which is nearly two miles from the Wye, does not occupy the site of the old monastic foundation. Hoarwithy at Llandinabo might stand for the guduit (gwyddfid), "honey suckles," in the Lann Junabui boundary.⁴ Llandinabo, which is dedication-less, may be regarded as the only church dedicated to him now.

Junabui must have been one of those who were driven from their foundations, either by the Yellow Plague, or by the Saxon devastations, after 577, for he appears in association with S. Teilo.⁵ He is described at first, under Dubricius, as a priest, but later as bishop of Llandaff,⁶ its supposed seventh bishop.

S. JUNANAU, Confessor

JUNANAU is invoked in the tenth century Celtic Calendar in the Library of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury.⁷

M. J. Loth supposes him to be the S. Junan who had formerly a chapel in Riantec, near Port S. Louis, in Morbihan, named in 1473. Another chapel of the same Saint, named in 1184, "au détriment du nom du malheureux saint," has become S. Aignan, near Pontivy, where he has a chapel beside the parish church, named S. Ignaw, transferred to S. Ignatius.⁸ In the Life of S. Samson the name that occurs as Winian in one version has Junavius in another. But this cannot be Junan.

S. JUNCUS, Confessor

JUNCUS is stated in Nasmith's edition of the Itinerary of William of Worcester to lie at Pelynt in Cornwall. In the original MS. the name is not Juncus but Illaw.

¹ Book of Llan Dáv. p. 163.

² Ibid., p. 164.

³ Ibid., pp. 73, 364.

⁴ Ibid., p. 73; Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, p. 273

⁵ Ibid., p. 115.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 163-5.

⁷ Revue Celtique, 1888, p. 82.

⁸ Ibid., 1890, p. 145.

For Comment

W. J. Loth and with St

W. J. Loth
 1890
 1890

S. JUST, Priest, Confessor

S. JUST in Penwith is a different person from S. Just in Roseland, as the Land's End district was exclusively settled ecclesiastically by Irish, the only exceptions being the intrusive foundations of S. Paul, Gulval, and Towednack.

Just is said to have been a son of Fergus, descended from Breasal Brealach, grandson of Cathair Mór, King of Leinster. He lived at the same time as Dunlang, King of Leinster, who died before 460, and as Iollain, his successor, who was baptised at Naas by S. Patrick.

S. Patrick took him into his missionary band, and ordained him deacon.¹

The glossator on the Calendar of Oengus says of him: "The Deacon Justinus, i.e. Deacon Just, of Fidarta. It was he who baptised Ciaran of Cluain (Clonmacnois), and of France was he, ut quidem putant." But against this hesitating opinion we may set his recorded pedigree. It is, however, very probable that he went to Gaul for his ecclesiastical education. It is possible enough that there may have been two of the same name, and at the same period, one at Fidarta, and the other at Ardraccan; but it is more likely that, as Just had a roving commission, he founded both these churches.

Fidarta, where S. Patrick placed him, at all events for a time, is Fuerty, in Roscommon, which was in the old territory of the Hy Many. S. Patrick left his book of ritual and of baptism with him. He was the preceptor of Ciaran of Saighir, and in his old age he baptised the other Ciaran, the wheelwright's son. Unfortunately no Life of this Saint has been preserved. Although known as Patrick's Deacon, there is no reason to suppose that he was not advanced later to priest's orders.

William of Worcester calls S. Just a martyr, but this is because the true S. Just of Penwith had been supplanted by a namesake who did suffer for the Faith, and who was in the Roman Calendar. At S. Just, the feast varies from October 30 to November 8. The rule seems to be that its observance is guided by the Sunday preceding the nearest Wednesday in November which will give seven clear Sundays to Christmas.

Just, or Justin, Patrick's Deacon, is commemorated in the Irish Calendars on May 5.

We find a S. Just, under the form Ust, in Wales, as the original patron (with Dyfnig) of Llanwrin, in Montgomeryshire, and of the extinct chapel of Llanust, near Fishguard. He is said to have come from Armorica with Cadfan.

¹ Tripartite Life, pp. 104, 305, 318.

Also Just. in y. S. David's in II 268 9

S. JUSTINIAN, Hermit, Martyr

THE authority for this Life is a Vita by John of Tynemouth in Cotton MS. Tiberius E. i. pt. ii, ff. 125b-126b, printed in Capgrave's Nova Legenda Angliæ, ed. 1901 ii, pp. 93-5. He probably copied or condensed it from one found at S. David's, when he was on his tour through England and Wales collecting material for his works, the Martilogium and Sanctilogium, which were taken into Capgrave's book. It has been reprinted in Acta SS. Boll. August 23, iv. pp. 635-6.

Justinian was a native of Brittany,¹ who came over to Wales in the sixth century, and landed on Ramsey Island, then called Limeneia, after a brief sojourn in a territory called Chormeum.

He found on the island a certain Honorius, son of King Thefriauc, or Tyfriog, with his sister and her maid, who were there leading an eremitical life. Honorius respected the superior age and virtues of the newly arrived Justinian, and offered him the hospitality of his cell.

"I will accept it," said the stranger, "if you will turn out your sister and her maid, and make them keep their distance." A requisition this, which we are informed, provoked much irreverent derision.²

"That I may enjoy your agreeable conversation," replied Honorius, "I will pack them off." And this ungallant, but not injudicious, condition made by Justinian was carried into effect. The sister and her maid were dismissed "in longinquas regiones."

A good many disciples came over to Ramsey and placed themselves under the direction of Justinian. S. David now sent for him, and so admired his sanctity that he made him his "soul-friend," or confessor, and adviser in spiritual matters, so that he must have been a priest. David not only sanctioned his residence on the island, but also accorded him a site on the mainland for his disciples. The bare rocky isle of Ramsey lies off the coast of Treginnis, the southern horn of the headland on which stands S. David's. It is a mile and three-quarters long by one mile broad, and rises to two hills, Carn Ysgubor, 300 feet above the sea, and Carn Llundain, rising 446 feet, each surmounted by ancient cairns. It has two little ports on the land side, and is separated from Treginnis by a dangerous channel, rather over a mile across, but narrowing to the south. In the mid channel is a rock, the Horse, about which the sea swirls and breaks into foam. The tide sweeps through the channel like a mill-race, and except in calm weather the crossing to the island cannot be attempted. The red Cambrian rocks rise precipitously out of the ocean on all sides, gorgeous in the evening sun as they stand up out of the emerald water, fringed with foam. Only at the two little harbours do they stoop to a lap of sand, and allow a boat to run ashore. On the ocean side, however, to the west, is a beach, but it is frowned down on by the cliffs. Probably on the grassy sweep where now stands a little farm above the Road Isaf, stood the tiny monastery of Justinian, with the docile Honorius under him.

¹ "Sanctus Justinianus ex nobilissima Britannie Minoris prosapia originem duxit." Ptolemy, in his Geography, ii, c. 2, calls Ramsey Λίμνον ἔρημος. Its Welsh name is Ynys yr Hyrddod, which is the equivalent in meaning to Ramsey.

² "Petitioni tue assentirem, si soror tua cum sua pedissequa cubiculum habeat a nobis remotum. Quod quibusdam incredulis vertebatur in derisum."

The same incident is told of him as of Gildas. One day a boat entered the bay, manned by five men, who came to announce to him that his friend David was dangerously ill and desired his attendance. Justinian at once, without hesitation, entered the boat, and the rowers thrust off. But when they were half-way across, Justinian saw by the expression of their faces that they purposed mischief, and he began to chant the psalm, "Deus in adiutorium." So soon as he reached the second verse, "Confundantur et revereantur qui quærent animam meam," they were transformed to devils, and flew away in the shape of crows. Then a stone rose up out of the water, and Justinian mounting it was carried over to the mainland, and on reaching the monastery of David, found that saint hearty and well.

On the island itself, Justinian had three serfs, whom he kept diligently employed on farming operations and fishing. Weary of his strict discipline they conspired to kill him, and falling on him one day, cut off his head.¹

Then Justinian, rising up, took his head in his hands, and walking over the water, crossed the sound to the little harbour on the mainland, and there laid his head down. There he was buried, and a chapel was erected on the spot, and the little harbour still bears his

¹ Drayton, in his Polyolbion (1622, pt. ii, 24th song), is not quite correct:—

"Justinian, as that man a Sainted place deseru'd,
Who still to feed his soule, his sinfull body steru'd:
And for that height in zeale, whereto he did attaine,
There by his fellow Monkes most cruelly was slaine."

name, Porth Stinan. S. David translated his body to a new tomb in his own church, in which he was subsequently buried himself.

One is inclined to ask, Where was the faithful Honorius all this while? There is something kept back by the narrator. We may suspect that jealousy had sprung up, and that the attempt to drown Justinian, and, finally his murder, were due to this; and that, conceivably, Honorius was at the bottom of it. Certainly Honorius drops in a remarkable manner out of the story and has not received honours, usually so liberally accorded, as a saint.

The murderers were smitten with leprosy, and withdrew to an isolated rock which still bears the name of Gwahan-garreg, "the Leper's Rock," where they passed the rest of their days in penitence. This is the legendary interpretation of the name, which, with greater probability, means "the Dividing Rock." It lies near the middle of the Sound, and "divides" the current.

Capel Stinan is placed immediately over the cliffs which shelter the little harbour of Porth Stinan. It is over a mile from S. David's, to the west. "Here those who frequented the Island of Ramsey were wont to put up their prayers for a safe passage over the dangerous fretum that separated it from the main, or to return thanks for their preservation after a prosperous voyage."¹ The present structure, a beautiful ruin, is attributed to Bishop Vaughan. There is a well by it.

There were formerly two chapels on Ramsey Island, Capel Stinan and Capel Dyfanog, the one to the south and the other to the north of the little island. Each had a fine spring of pure water running by it.² The island was sometimes called Ynys Dyfanog, from the latter saint. Fenton³ quotes a Welsh distich alluding to the neighbourhood of these two saints in Ramsey, "Stinan a Devanog, Dau anwyl gymmydog" (Justinian and Dyfanog, Two dear neighbours). Where Justinian's head fell in Ramsey a spring miraculously sprang up, which became celebrated for its cures. To Justinian is dedicated the church of Llanstinan, near Fishguard.

The festival of Justinian, December 5, is given in the Calendars in Cotton, MS. Vesp. A. xiv. and Additional MS. 14, 886, and by William of Worcester and Nicolas Roscarrock.

On the same day by Whytford: "In Wales at the mynster of saynt

¹ Fenton, Pembrokeshire, 1811, p. 113; Basil Jones and Freeman, S. David's, 1856, pp. 224-6. The form Stinan comes from Justinianus, which is Capgrave's spelling of the Saint's name.

² Browne Willis, S. David's, 1717, p. 59.

³ Pembrokeshire, p. 123; cf. Camden's Britannia, ed. 1722, ii. 763.

David the feast of saynt Iustiniane a bysshop & martyr, borne of the noble blode of the lesse brytayne, and for Chryst he forsoke his countree and kynne, & was ledde by an aūgell in to many coūtrees, where he euer dyd many myracles, & at the last he came vnto saynt David & was his dayly ghostly fader, where his own servaūtes by-cause he rebuked theyr synnes stroke of his heed, & bare it ouer the see, & the people folowed as though it had ben the drye lande vnto they came where now he lyeth full of myracles." Also Wilson in his Martyrologe of 1608, and 1640, on the same day. The Bollandists, Cressy, and Rees,¹ however, give his day as August 23.

S. JUTWARA, see S. AUDE

S. KEA, see S. CYNAN (Kenan)

S. KENTIGERN, see S. CYNDEYRN

S. KERIAN or KIERAN, see S. CIARAN

S. KEWE, see S. CIWA

S. KEYNE, see S. CAIN

S. LAURUS, see S. LEUBRI

S. LEONORE, Bishop, Confessor

THE authorities for the Life of this Saint are a Vita beginning "Fuit vir quidam," in the Bibl. Nat. at Paris, MS. Lat. 5317, of which De Smedt has given extracts in Catalogus Codicum hagiographicorum bibl. lat. in Bibliotheca nationali Parisiensi, ii, pp. 153 et seq. A MS. Life, formerly in the Bibliothèque S. Germain, from which the Bollandists printed the Life in Acta SS., July 1, i, pp. 118-25, is no longer to be found. There was also a Life of S. Leonore in the Library at Arras, that had been seen by the Bollandists.

S. Leonore, or Lunaire, was a native of South Wales. His father was called Beteloc, which is probably a misscript for Hoeloc. His mother's name was Alma Pompeia, who is almost certainly the same as the Alma who was mother of S. Tudwal.

At the age of five he was sent to S. Illtyd to be trained for the ecclesiastical profession. His brilliant abilities, according to the author of the Life, who indulges in extravagance, induced S. Dubricius to consecrate him bishop when he was aged but fifteen years. This absurdity is probably due to a copyist who omitted xx from xxxv. Then he resolved on going to Brittany, and he left Wales in a boat that was navigated by three men in white raiment. He had with him seventy-two disciples,¹ and many servants. The three mysterious white-vested mariners managed the vessel, one stood midships, one at the prow, and the third held the rudder.

¹ Welsh Saints, p. 319.

A furious storm swept the sea, and the voyagers were compelled to cast everything overboard, down to the stone altar-slab of S. Leonore.

At length Armorica was reached. As they landed, Leonore saw two white doves raise his altar out of the sea, and bring it to him. On disembarkation, the three white-raimented mariners vanished.

The immigrants had come ashore in a sandy bay, backed by sand-hills, sheltered on the west by the rocky point of Decollé, a little west of the now fashionable watering-place of Dinard. Here a feeble stream, the Crevelon, empties itself into the sea. At the period, forest covered the country, and the trees, though bent away from the sea, nearly approached the coast. The little band set to work to cut down the timber and to construct habitations. When, however, they looked for seed-corn among their stores, they found to their dismay that it had been cast overboard in the storm.

The story goes that Leonore knelt in prayer. Then one of his monks spied a robin redbreast perched on a stump, with an ear of corn in its beak, which the bird, when scared, let fall. The grain was sown and carefully harvested, re-sown next year, and so on, till from the ear of robin redbreast sprang the cornfields of the monastery. In the meanwhile the colony subsisted on fish and milk, and the wild birds and beasts that they snared.

At this time Childebert was king of the Franks, and he extended his rule over Armorica; but a British settler, Riguald, or Righuel, or Hoel the king, had established himself in Domnonia, and exercised rule over the settlers.² He was a kinsman of Leonore, and came as well from Glamorgan. He would seem to have been Leonore's uncle, brother of his mother, if we admit the identity of Alma Pompeia with Alma, mother of Tudwal. Much about this time Tudwal also arrived from South Wales, bringing with him his mother and, according to tradition, his sister Sceva; but he and they settled further to the west; and Brioc, also a kinsman by marriage, landed in the estuary of the Gouet.

¹ This number is not to be accepted literally. Tudwal is said to have brought over precisely the same number, which is taken from that of Christ's disciples.

² "Fuit vir unus in Britannia ultra mare, nomine Rigaldus, qui in nostra provincia venit citra mare habitare provincia, qui dux fuit Britonum ultra et citra mare usque ad mortem." Vita, in De Smedt, Catalog. cod. Parisiis.

Leonore's little colony worked hard, clearing the ground for agricultural occupations, but was perplexed how to deal with the logs they had felled. With much labour they rolled them into the bed of the little stream, which they choked with them, but, happily, heavy rains swelled the petulant Crevelon into a torrent, and it swept the encumbrance into the sea,¹ where the tide carried the logs about, like ducks swimming in the water.² The stumps they destroyed with fire.

The work of settlement exhausted the colonists, they became sulky and murmured, and formed a plot to desert Leonore and seek a more favourable site elsewhere. But he got wind of it, and by expostulations and persuasion appeased the malcontents.

The biographer says that he managed to secure a dozen big stags (cervos grandissimos) and trained them to bear the yoke, to plough and draw burdens. The story need not be dismissed as pure fiction. It is possible enough that such beasts, if caught young, might be rendered docile, and the ploughing required of them would be merely the drawing over the soil of a forked stick to lightly scratch the surface.

When the seed had multiplied sufficiently for a real sowing of a harvest field, the occasion was celebrated as one of great rejoicing. Leonore led the way to the field, followed by all the brethren from the oldest down to the youngest.³

One day, after labour in the fields, Leonore was leaning on his staff, when he observed something glittering in the soil thrown up by the moles. He dug at the spot and unearthed a gold statue of a ram, a relic of the Gallo-Roman occupation. "Gold is for kings and not for priests," said he, and laid the curious object aside for use should need for it arise later.⁴

¹ "Repererunt totam silvam in mari funditus jactam, et nichil in eodem campo remansit nec spinarum neque tribulorum aliquid quod impedimentum fecisset sarculo nec aratro." Bibl. Nat. MS. Lat., 5317.

² "Viderunt natantem silvam et coagitatam super mare, sicut anseres flante vento in flumine." Ibid.

³ "Leonorus sparsit in campum semen primus, et post eum omnes fratres illius, senes similiter cum junioribus, ceperunt campum seminare." Ibid.

⁴ "Quadam die, cum vellet scire qualiter messis proficeret, sumptis tribus discipulis, ad agrum vadit. Dum autem in capite campi super baculum requiesceret, apparuit forma aurei arietis in terra, quem talpæ, ex more fodiendo terram in circuitu, discooperuerant. Quo extracto a loco, ait: Aurum convenit regibus, non sacerdotibus." Vita S. Leonor. ex MS. Atreb., Acta SS. Boll., Jul. i, p. 121.

And, indeed, bad times came on. Righuel died, and the power over Domnonia fell into the hands of Conmore, Count of Poher, who obtained from Childebert the office of vicegerent in Brittany. Jonas, the Domnonian king, died, and Conmore at once married the widow. Here the author of the Life makes a curious blunder. He confounds Jonas with Righuel.¹ The widow of Jonas had a son, Judual, by her first husband, and he accompanied her to her new home. One night she dreamed that the men of Brittany came to her son, seated on a mountain top, and put their staves into his hand. She had the indiscretion to communicate her dream to Conmore, who interpreted it as signifying his own death, and the accession of Judual in his place; and bursting into a fury, he declared that it was his wife's design to accomplish his death for the sake of her son's advancement.

The woman, in alarm, sent Judual to take sanctuary with S. Leonore; but the Abbot, not feeling confident that the Regent would respect the rights of sanctuary, and learning that he was approaching, thrust the boy on board ship, and sent him off to sea.

Conmore, at the time when this took place, was probably at Montefilant, to the west of the old Roman city of Corseul. It is a fortress planted on a point of land with a valley on each side, and accessible only by an isthmus to the south. In later times a mediæval castle was erected there, but the prehistoric camp, which was that in all likelihood utilized by Conmore, remains intact.

When Conmore heard that Judual had fled to Leonore, he was further incensed, pursued him to the monastery, and peremptorily demanded the surrender of the refugee.

"He is yonder," replied Leonore, pointing to a white sail in the offing.

Conmore, furious, struck Leonore full in the face with his fist, and retired wrathful and discouraged.

What he feared had, in fact, taken place, Judual had sought refuge with Childebert. Conmore at once sent a deputation to the Frank king to urge his own claims, and to prepossess him against the British prince. His representations induced Childebert to keep Judual at Paris under restraint.

Leonore, redoubling the violence of the Regent, himself now took the road to Paris. He was well received, the more so as he produced the golden ram that he had found, and presented it to the king, whose jewellers estimated the value as, in present money, £3,600. Childe-bert was lavish in his promises. "I desire nothing," said the Abbot, "save the value of the ram in land, and security of tenure. The district was a wilderness. We have cleared and tilled it, and it is but just that we should be allowed to occupy it without hindrance."

¹ "Mortuo autem Rigaldo remansit uxor ejus cum suo filio, nomine Jugualus." Bib. Nat. MS. Lat. 537. Judual was son of Jonas, not of Righuel; Jonas was grandson of Righuel or Rivold, but probably succeeded him immediately.

"Go to the top of the hill nearest to your monastery," said the king, "and ring your bell. The land is yours so far as the sound of the bell reaches."

Thus secured against molestation, Leonore returned to his settlement, where Conmore did not venture to interfere with him.

Judual was equally successful. As we have seen, he had been persecuted by Conmore, and had betaken himself to Paris to solicit protection, which had been guaranteed to him by Childebert. But the saintly brothers, if brothers they were, were thorns in the side of the Regent. They fomented discontent; and prepared the ground for the rising under the skilful leadership of Samson, who brought Judual back from Paris, a rising that ended in the defeat and death of Conmore in 555.

Leonore did not long survive the accession of Judual to the throne; he died at the age of fifty-one about the year 606, and was buried in his monastery, the site of which bears his name, altered into S. Lunaire.

His tomb is in the old parish church, which has happily escaped destruction, when a pretentious and ugly modern church was erected at a little distance from it. Probably the sarcophagus, which is rude, is the original tomb, but over this has been placed a monumental effigy, in the fifteenth century, representing the Saint as a bishop. On his breast is figured a dove bearing his portable altar.

In the ancient Breviary of Léon his day is given as July 1. So also the Vannes Missal of 1530, and the MS. fifteenth century Breviary of S. Méen. So likewise the Paris Breviary till 1607, when the observance of his day was suppressed. In the Dol Breviary of 1769, the commemoration was transferred to February 16. At Coutance it was transferred to July 3.

The translation of the Saint's relics to Beaumont-sur-Oise, which took place in the tenth century, is commemorated in the S. Malo Missal of 1609 on October 13.

.S LEUBRI or LAURUS, Abbot, Confessor

LEUBRI is invoked in the Celtic Litany of the tenth century published by D'Arbois de Jubainville.¹ He is not included in the other Celtic

¹ Revue Celtique, iii, p. 449.

Litanies, published by Warren, Mabillon, and that in the Missal of S. Vougai. M. J. Loth supposes that this Leubri is S. Léry,¹ who receives a cult in Domnonia, and whose name has been Latinized into Laurus.

The original Life existed in a MS. Breviary of the Abbey of Montfort in Ille-et-Vilaine, that had belonged to the church of S. Léry. A copy of this is in the Blancs-Manteaux Collection, Bibl. Nat., Paris, MSS. Français, xxxviii. See also Acta SS. Boll., Sept. viii, pp. 692-7, and Lobineau, Vies des Saints de Bretagne, ed. Tresvaux, Paris, 1836, ii, pp. 85-94.

Lobineau made a curious mistake. He says: "On a quelque sujet de croire qu'il était de Brouïerech, c'est-à-dire du pays de Vannes," and he has been followed by De la Borderie.² But for this there is no authority. He is said to have been a man of noble origin, and to have crossed over from Britain, and to have landed at Aleth in the reign of Judicael, 610-40.

Whoever Léry was, when he arrived he went up country into the dense and extensive forest of Brecilien, where Judicael had a hunting lodge at Gael, and after acquiring the favour of the Queen, Morona, he asked the prince to give him lands on which to settle. The most economical way of satisfying him, was by turning another saint out of his nest and offering it to the new-comer. There was such a saint, Ellocan, living on the Doneff, that feeds the pretty lake du Duc above Ploërmel. He received notice to quit, and then his cell and lands were made over to Léry.

Disciples gathered round him, and he ministered to the spiritual needs of the settlers in the stray clearings of the forest, but devoted his special attention to the people of the region round Aleth. He is said to have succeeded in converting from idolatry some of the original natives. He maintained the favour of Judicael till that prince abdicated, in or about 640, and retired into a monastery. Léry died at an advanced age in his monastery on September 30, and was placed in a stone coffin he had brought with him from Britain.

At the time of the incursion of the Northmen, his body was translated to Tours.

S. Laurus is entered in the ancient calendar of S. Méen on September 30. The tomb is at S. Léry, but is a structure of the fifteenth century. On it the saint is represented in monastic habit, a crosier under the left arm, holding a book in both hands, his feet resting on a dog. Above the tomb is a wooden bas-relief of the sixteenth century representing the death of the saint, his funeral and exaltation.

¹ Revue Celtique, xi, p. 146

² Hist. de Bretagne, i, p. 484.

S. LEUTIERN or LUGHTIERN, Bishop, Confessor

INVOKED in the Celtic tenth century Litany in the Library of the Dean and Chapter at Salisbury,¹ and as Loutiern in that published by Mabillon.² He is probably the Lughtiern who was abbot of Ennistymon in County Clare. Little is known of him. He is commemorated on April 28, in several Irish Martyrologies, as those of Tallaght, Donegal and O'Gorman. In the gloss on that of Oengus is—

Christopher, with Cronan,
Lughtiern with starkness,
On his feast, without vainglory
Went many soldiers to martyrdom.³

Brigh, daughter of Forannan, son of Conall, was his mother, and his father seems to have been Cutrita. Lughtiern was disciple of S. Ruadhan of Lothra. He was abbot of Ennistymon, and, along with S. Lasrean of Druim Liag, paid a visit to S. Ita, and remained three days with her, after which, having received her blessing, they returned home.⁴

No Life of this Saint exists. As S. Ita died in 570, and he was her contemporary, we must set him down as flourishing at the end of the sixth century.

He would seem to have gone to Brittany, if the Leuthern be the same whose relics were carried to Paris by Salvator, Bishop of Aleth, in 965, on account of the ravages caused by the Northmen. Hugh Capet, in the time of Lothair, transported them to the church of S. Bartholomew in Paris.⁵

As there was a monastic establishment, founded by S. Brendan, in Césambre, off Aleth, and as several Irish saints did settle on the Rance and at its source, it is possible enough that this saint did visit Brittany and die there.

Garaby very confidently identifies the two. He says: "The Lord desiring to open a vaster field for the labours of His servant, Louthiern was consecrated Bishop in Britain. . . . He passed into Armorica. There he spent the rest of his life . . . in the neighbourhood of S. Malo." ⁶ But he gives no authority for the statement.

¹ Revue Celtique, ix, p. 88.

² Vetera Analecta, 1723, ii, p. 669.

³ Félice of Oengus, ed. Stokes, 1871, p. lxxvii.

⁴ Colgan, Acta SS. Hibern., i, p. 70.

⁵ Duchesne, Script. Hist. Franc., iii, p. 344.

⁶ Vies des SS. et Bienheureux de Bretagne, 1839, pp. 444-5.

S. LEVAN, Priest, Confessor

S. LEVAN's Church, in Cornwall, is in the district colonized by Irish settlers, and he is not unknown to the Irish.

We must reject as untenable the assertion made by Dr. Oliver, and others after him, that Levan is Livinus, apostle of the Frisians, who died in 773, concerning whom a Life was forged in the eleventh century.

Levan is the Irish Loebhan. He was a saint at Killevan in Clonfert and Kilmore, where are three chapels dedicated to him. Killevan was his monastic foundation.

In the Egerton MS. list of the four and twenty persons in holy orders who were with S. Patrick, he is classed as one of his smiths. "Mac Cecht (Laebán) of Domnach Laebán—it is he that made the [bell called] Findfardech," which means "the sweet-toned." Colgan also held that Loebhan and Mac Cecht (son of a plough) are one and the same. But in the list of S. Patrick's household in the Leabhar Breac he is distinguished from Mac Cecht, erroneously we think.

As so very little is known of him in Ireland—so completely does he disappear from among the disciples of the Apostle,—we may suspect that he, like Carannog, left him, and that, moreover, at an early period in Loebhan's career.

We hear of a Loevan or Loenan as associated with Paul of Léon when he left Wales and came to Brittany. But whether this be the same we cannot be sure. He accompanied S. Tudwal to Paris, with eleven other disciples. On that occasion, as none of these Celtic monks could speak the Frank tongue, they asked S. Albinus of Angers to serve as their interpreter. The object of Paul and Tudwal going to the Frank King, Childebert, was to obtain a confirmation of their several grants of land. S. Albinus, or Aubin, was a native of Vannes, and therefore able to speak the British tongue. In 538–40 Conmore usurped the regency of Domnonia, and it was then that Tudwal and Paul visited Childebert.

This same Loevan or Levan wrote the Life of S. Tudwal, a Life that is still extant,¹ that was originally written in Irish. Tudwal died in or about 553 or 559.

The probable date for the death of S. Patrick is 493.² We cannot say at what time in his apostolic work Levan was with him; perhaps late, and then only for a short while. There is, however, a difficulty in reconciling the dates, and if the Patrician Loebhan be the same as the

¹ De la Borderie, Saint Tudual, Textes des trois Vies, Vita 1ma, Mémoires de la Soc. Archéol. des Côtes-du-Nord, 2nd ser., T. ii, p. 84.

² Shearman, Loca Patriciana, Dublin, 1882, p. 451.

Loevan who wrote in Irish the Life of Tudwal, he must have lived to an advanced age.

In Ireland, S. Loebhan, of Ath-eguis, occurs in the Martyrologies on June 1,¹ but the place cannot be identified; and the name without indication of place, on August 9. As in Brittany his Pardon is observed on the second Sunday in August, this seems to identify Loevan with the Loebhan on August 9. At S. Levan in Penwith, the feast is observed on October 15.

Loevan or Loenan, the associate of S. Paul, founded Treflaouenan in the diocese of Léon, and as a companion of S. Tudwal he has a chapel at Ploulech in Tréguier. He has also a chapel at Plounevez-Moedec.

Probably Porthleven in Cornwall had originally a chapel bearing his name. Dr. Borlase visited the church of S. Levan in 1740, and says² :— "Whilst we were at dinner at the inn, it was very pleasant to hear the good old woman, our landlady, talk of S. Levin, his cursing the name Johannah, his taking the same two fishes twice following, his entertaining his sister, Manaccan; and as a confirmation of everything we were desir'd at our departure to observe his walk, the stone he fish'd upon, with some other particulars of like importance."

The original oratory and the holy well of the Saint were on the edge of the cliff, a little below the church. Some remains of the well may yet be seen. In the church, on one of the bench-ends, he is represented with a cap, in which is a pilgrim's scallop, in a mantle; and in one hand a knotted rope, in the other a book.

In Art, he should be represented with a bell and a smith's tool.

At Ploulech, in Brittany, he is figured as an abbot, bare headed, a staff in one hand and an open book in the other. At Trédarzac as a bishop. He is invoked on behalf of rickety children. His feast is kept on the 2nd Sunday in September. He is perhaps invoked as Loviau or Lovian in the eleventh century Celtic Litany published by M. D'Arbois de Jubainville. M. J. Loth says: "Le nom de ce saint varie entre Leviavus et Levianus."

When the relics of so many Breton Saints were being carried away from the coast because of the devastations of the Northmen, in the tenth century, among those transported to a place of greater security were the relics of Leviavi Episcopi.³ Loviau is perhaps a misreading for Lovian or Levian.

¹ Martyrologies of Tallaght, of O'Gorman, of Donegal, and of Cathal McGuire.

² MS. Par. Mem., p. 4, No. 3.

³ Duchesne, Script. Hist. Franc., iii, p. 344.

S. LIBIAU, Hermit

WHAT is known of this saint, whose name would now be Llibio, is to be found in the Life of S. Clydog, and a grant in the Book of Llan Dâv.¹ He, his brother Gurvan, and their sister's son, Cinvur, left, through some dispute, their native cantref of Penychen, in Mid-Glamorgan, and settled down to an eremitical life at Merthyr Clydog or Clodock, in Herefordshire, on the banks of the Monnow, where, "with the advice and assistance of the bishop of Llandaff, they built an improved church." They were granted lands, on both sides of the Monnow, to their church by Pennbargaut, King of Morganwg. The three hermits were "the first inhabitants and cultivators of the place after the martyrdom of Clydog."

Ithel, the son of Morgan, King of Glywysing, subsequently made a grant of their territory to the church of Llandaff in the time of Bishop Berthguin.

Llech Lybiau, Libiau's Stone, is mentioned in the description of the boundary of Mathern, in Monmouthshire.²

Libiau was the name of the 24th reputed Bishop of Llandaff.³ He died in 929.

For the Anglesey saint of the name see under S. LLIBIO.

S. LILY, Confessor

BROWNE Willis, in his Survey of the Cathedral Church of S. David's,⁴ 1717, appears to be the sole authority for this saint, whom he calls Lily Gwas Dewi, S. David's Servant.⁵ After alluding to the observance at S. David's of the Festivals of S. David on March 1, S. Non (his mother) on the 2nd, and S. Lily (his servant) on the 3rd, he says: "There is a tradition still preserved among the old people of the place, that within these hundred years, or not much earlier, at least many years after the Reformation, these two saints, S. Nun and S. Lily, had as much honour paid them by the country people, as S. David himself; and if any of them had been known to work upon any of those days, it would have been esteemed as a very heinous offence. Now only S. David's Day is observed."

¹ Pp. 194-5.

² Ibid., pp. 142, 369.

³ Ibid., pp. 303, 312.

⁴ Pp. 36, 53.

⁵ For this use of Gwas see under S. IEUAN GWAS PADRIG.

Later writers speak of him as a beloved disciple and constant attendant on S. David, and say that there was a chapel dedicated to him at S. David's. But we possess no authentic information about him. His festival day is not entered in as much as one Welsh calendar.

S. LUCIA, see S. LLEUCI

S. LUCIUS, King, Confessor

BEDE, in his Chronicle, written about 725, says:—

“A. 161–180. M. Antoninus Verus cum fratre Aurelio Commodo annos decem, mensis unum, etc. . . . Defuncto Commodo fratre, Antoninum Commodum filium suum consortem regni facit, etc. . . . Lucius Britanniae rex missa ad Eleutherum Romae episcopum epistola ut Christianus efficiatur, impetrat.”

By M. Antoninus Verus Bede means M. Aelius Aurelius Antoninus Verus, commonly known as Marcus Aurelius. He was emperor from 161 to 180.

By Aurelius Commodus he means Lucius Ceionius Aelius Aurelius Commodus Verus, commonly known as Lucius Verus. He was co-regent with Marcus Aurelius from 161 to 169.

According to Bede in his Chronicle, the message of Lucius arrived when Lucius Verus was dead, i.e., after 169 and before 180. Eleutherius was bishop of Rome from 17 $\frac{4}{5}$ to 192, consequently the alleged letter and deputation from Britain arrived between the years 175 and 180.

But Bede, in his Ecclesiastical History, written in 731 says, (i. 4): “A. ab Incarn. Domini 156 M. Antonius Verus decimus quartus ab Augusto regnum cum Aurelio fratre suscepit. Quorum temporibus quum Eleutherius vir sanctus pontificatus Romae ecclesiae praecesset, misit ad eum Lucius Britanniarum rex epistolam obsecrans ut per ejus mandatum Christianus efficeretur, et mox effectum pie postulationis effectus est. Susceptamque fidem Britanni usque in tempora Diocletiani principis inviolatam integramque quietam in pace servabant.” Here Bede makes the mission of Lucius take place before 169 when Lucius Verus died. He further gives a date for the accession of Marcus Aurelius which is wrong, 156 instead of 161. Now as Lucius Verus died before Eleutherius became pope, he has obviously fallen into chronological error.

But at the end of his History, Bede gives a chronological summary (v. 24), and in that summary he writes:—"A. Dom. Incarn. 167 Eleutherius Romæ præsul factus xv annis ecclesiam gloriosissime rexit : cui literas rex Britannia Lucius mittens, ut Christianus efficeretur petiit et impetravit."

Here he gives a wrong date for Eleutherius, he puts him some seven years too early. In 167 Soter was bishop of Rome. The reason of the discrepancy is that in his Chronicle Bede followed the computation of the Eusebian-Hieronyman Chronicle, De temporum ratione, whereas in his History he followed the dates given by Orosius, and then, in his Epitome at the end, reverted to the authority of Eusebius-Jerome.

But neither of his authorities mentioned the deputation of Lucius. He had got hold of the statement that Lucius, King of Britain, sent a letter to Eleutherius, and he tried to fit it into his history as best he might, and that was clumsily and unchronologically.

Bede drew his information concerning Lucius and his embassy solely from the Catalogue of the Bishops of Rome, which he quotes almost verbatim.

Now of the early Catalogues there are two. Of these the first contains a list of eighteen bishops from S. Peter to Urban (222-230), and this was continued to about 354, during the pontificate of Liberius. In it the message of Lucius is not mentioned at all. The entry under Eleutherius is: "Eleutherius annis (desunt) fuit temporibus Antonini et Commodi, a consulatu Veri et Erenniani usque Paterno et Bradno (191)." ¹ That is all.

The second Catalogue is the so-called Felician Catalogue, because it closes with Felix III (IV). This, however, is held not to be an original Liber Pontificalis, but an extract from it. It was drawn up between 483 and 492. This contains the passage under the head of Eleutherius:—"Hic accepit epistolam a Lucio Britannio rege ut Christianus efficeretur per ejus mandatum." ²

Now it is worthy of remark that, on the face of it, the paragraph has all the appearance of an interpolation. The form of all the entries of the early pontiffs is this formulary: N., natione . . .

¹ There is a blunder here. Alfidius Herennianus was consul in 171 and then not in conjunction with Lucius Verus, but with T. Statilius Severus. M. Herennius Secundus was consul in 183 along with the Emperor Commodus. The Liberian Catalogue, drawn up by Furius Dionysius Filocalus, scribe to Pope Damasus, is printed by Mommsen, Ueber den Chronographen von 354, in Abhandlungen d. Königlicher Acadam. von Sachsen, Leipzig, 1850, i, pp. 547 et seq. Duchesne, Liber Pontificalis, Paris, 1886, i, pp. 2-12 ex patre . . . sedit annos . . . menses . . . dies . . . Fuit autem temporibus . . . Augusti, a consulatu . . . usque ad consulatum . . . Hic constituit . . . Hic fecit ordinationes . . . in urbe Roma per mens. decembr., presbiteros . . . diaconos . . . episcopos per diversa loca numero . . . qui etiam sepultus est . . . et cessavit episcopatus dies. . . ." No details about transactions abroad. Moreover, we have no earlier MSS. of this Felician Catalogue than one of the ninth century.

² Duchesne, Liber Pontificalis, i, pp. 58, 136.

The Liber Pontificalis was drawn up at various periods, and was amplified as it proceeded through its several editions. It has been erroneously attributed to Anastasius Bibliothecarius. All the earlier portion was given its present shape in the sixth century. This has the entry under Eleutherius exactly as in the Felician Catalogue.

In the first place, it may be noted how almost absurd it was to make a King of Britain at the time when M. Aurelius was Emperor, and Britain was a portion of the Empire. No writer of a notice at the time could have so described a Lucius, if he ever existed, and was a petty chieftain in Britain. It was not till after the Roman hold on Britain ceased in 410 that kingship began to reappear in the island. Moreover, had the Britons desired Christian missionaries and bishops, they would have sent into Gaul for them in all probability.

The next point to consider is, how and when this passage was inserted in the Liber Pontificalis.

It is clear that Bede knew no more about Lucius and his embassy, and its results, than what he got from the text of the Catalogue he had before him.

Gildas, who wrote his book about 540, knew nothing of Lucius, or he would assuredly have mentioned him and his delegation to Eleutherius and the results, the conversion and baptism of the British people.

Pope Gregory knew nothing about it when in 597 he wrote his long answer to a series of questions propounded to him by Augustine. Augustine had asked: "How are we to deal with the bishops of Gaul and Britain?" Gregory replied very fully relative to the Gallic prelates, Augustine was to exercise no jurisdiction over them, and he gives his reasons. "But as for all the bishops of Britain, we commit them to your care, that the unlearned may be taught, the weak strengthened by persuasion, and the perverse corrected by authority."¹

Now, had Gregory known of the conversion of Britain by legates from Rome with the authority of Eleutherius, he would have mentioned this as showing that the British Church was a daughter of the Church of Rome, that its Bishops derived orders and jurisdiction from the Chair of Peter, and that therefore he, Gregory, had a right to the oversight of that Church, and to the ordering of its affairs. But he did nothing of the sort.

¹ Bede, Hist. Eccl., i, c. 27.

It was, again, quite possible for Gregory to allude effectively to the same topic in the letter to King Ethelbert in 601, but not by a word does he intimate that he knew anything of the story.¹

Bede does not record the discussion between Augustine and the recalcitrant British Bishops at the "Oak." Nor does he give us the letter of Laurentius his successor to the British Bishops, though he does furnish us with that to the Irish Bishops and abbots. We are consequently unable to draw any conclusions therefrom.

In 664 was held the assembly at Whitby, when the Celtic Church in Northumbria stubbornly resisted Wilfrid, who desired to force on it the observance of the Roman computation for Easter. Bishop Colman, who spoke for the Celtic usage, appealed to tradition. "The Easter I keep, I received from my elders who sent me bishop hither; all our forefathers, men beloved of God, are known to have kept it after the same manner; and that the same may not seem contemptible to any or deserving of rejection, it is the same which S. John the Evangelist, with all the Churches over which he presided, is recorded to have observed."²

What a strong and crushing weapon would Colman have employed had he known of the Lucius story! He would have been able to say: "The British Church, and that of the Scots through the Church in Britain, received its rule for the celebration of Easter through those bishops sent by Eleutherius at the demand of Lucius. We have kept the tradition; it is you who have altered your computation."

The contention would have been unanswerable, at all events by Wilfrid; for up to the Council of Nicæa the practice of the British harmonized with that of the entire Western Church, and the most ancient Roman table for Easter tallies precisely with the British Easter, and it was not till 525 that Rome accepted the calculation of Dionysius Exiguus.³

In 680 a Council was held at Heathfield, under Archbishop Theodore, and S. Aldhelm was instructed to write an epistle to the Britons of Domnonia to urge them to submit to Rome. "Quid prosunt bonorum operum emolumenta," he asked, "si extra Catholicam gerantur ecclesiam?" He could not have written this had he supposed that the British Church had been founded by Papal legates. Aldhelm let slip no argument by means of which he hoped to induce the stubborn British Church to submit to the Latin Church. He would certainly have appealed to the story of Lucius, had he known it.¹

¹ Bede, Hist. Eccl., i, c. 32. ² Ibid., iii, c. 25. ³ Haddan & Stubbs, Councils, i, p. 152.

Some forty years later, Bede mentions the mission sent by Pope Eleutherius and the conversion of Britain. Surely had Gildas, S. Gregory, S. Augustine, S. Laurence, S. Colman, and S. Aldhelm known anything of this alleged mission, with its splendid results, they would one and all have harped upon it.

When the earlier portion of the Saxon Chronicle was drawn up, probably at the instigation of Archbishop Plegmund in 891, the passage from Bede's Ecclesiastical History was taken into it verbatim, but with the date 167 from his Epitome at the end.

The earliest British testimony to the story is that of Nennius, who compiled his History in or about 796, using for basis an earlier Volumen Britannicæ, composed in the seventh century. The story of Lucius and his embassy was, however, in the text used by Gilla Coemgin when he made his translation into Irish in or about 1071. However, it does not occur in the earliest extant MS. of the Historia Britonum, the Chartres Codex. It is therefore probably an addition, and it is an ignorant addition. It runs thus—"Post clxvii annos. post adventum Christi Lucius Britannicus rex cum omnibus regulis totius Britannicæ gentis baptismum suscepit missa legatione ab imperatore Romanorum et a papa Romano Eucharisto."²

The idea of a persecuting Emperor Marcus Aurelius combining with the Pope to get Britain converted, is absurd. Nennius has taken the date 167 from Bede, he has amplified the text and misread the name of the Pope. There never was an Eucharistus, and Evaristus was bishop of Rome about 100-9. Gilla Coemgin, the translator into Irish, altered the name to Eleutherius.

We need not concern ourselves further with Nennius.

From the silence of all those engaged in controversy in Britain down to Aldhelm we may fairly conclude that the story of Lucius was unknown in Britain, and in Rome till after 680, and that it was invented and forced fraudulently into the Liber Pontificalis after that date. There are no earlier MSS. of the Liber Pontificalis than the seventh century. The earliest is after 685.

It was done with a deliberate purpose, to furnish the Papal See with a claim to authority over the British Church. It did not originate in Britain, but at Rome, where such manufacture was by no means uncommon.

¹ S. Aldhelmi Opera, London, 1842, in vol. i of Patres Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ.

² Nennius, ed. Mommsen, p. 164.

The Roman story is copied into the Book of Llan Dâv, a compilation of the twelfth century. "In the year of Our Lord 156, Lucius, King of the Britons, sent his legates, Elfan and Medwyn, to Eleutherius, twelfth pope on the Apostolic Throne, imploring that, according to his admonition, he might be made a Christian," etc.¹

William of Malmesbury adds that the Roman Missionaries, Phaganus and Deruvianus, went to Glastonbury.

Geoffrey of Monmouth gives the final touches to the fable. According to him, Lucius, King of Britain, appealed by letter to Eleutherius the Pope, and by solemn decree converted all the heathen temples throughout his realm into Christian churches, and transformed the sees of twenty-eight flamens and three arch-flamens into as many bishoprics and archbishoprics. Faganus and Duvanus were the bishops sent by Eleutherius to convert the British. After having seen all Britain made Christian, the great King Lucius died childless at Gloucester in 156.

The next step in forgery was the composition of the rescript of Pope Eleutherius to Lucius: "anno centissimo sexagesimo nono a passione Christi (i.e. 202), scripsit Dominus Eleutherius Papa Lucio Regi Britanniae ad correctionem (al. petitionem) Regis et Procerum regni Britanniae." The letter is as follows:—

"Petistis a nobis leges Romanas et Cæsaris vobis transmitti, quibus in regno Britanniae uti voluistis. Leges Romanas et Cæsaris semper reprobare possumus, legem Dei nequaquam. Suscepistis enim nuper miseratione divina in regno Britanniae legem et fidem Christi. Habetis penes vos in regno utramque paginam. Ex illis Dei gratia per consilium regni vestri sume legem, et per illam Dei patientia vestrum rege Britanniae regnum. Vicarius vero Dei estis in regno . . . Gentes vero regni Britanniae et populi vestri sunt; quos divisos debetis in unum ad concordiam et pacem et ad fidem et ad legem Christi et ad Sanctam Ecclesiam congregare, revocare, fovere, manu tenere, protegere, regere, et ab injuriosis et malitiosis et ab inimicis semper defendere. . . . Rex dicitur a regendo, non a regno. Rex eris dum bene regis: quod nisi feceris nomen Regis non in te constabit, et nomen Regis perdes, quod absit. Det vobis omnipotens Deus regnum Britanniae sic regere ut possitis cum eo regnare in æternum, cujus vicarius estis in regno prædicto."

This forged rescript was taken into the laws of Edward the Confessor, and on the strength of it, Edward claimed the title of Vicar of God in England. "Rex autem quia Vicarius summi Regis est, ad hoc est constitutus, ut regnum terrenum, et populum Domini, et super omnia sanctam ejus veneretur ecclesiam, et regat, et ab injuriis defendat, et maleficos ab ea evellat." ¹

¹ P. 68; cf. p. 26.

There can be little doubt that this formed the basis of the pretensions of Henry VIII to be Supreme Head in Church as well as State in England.

Another forgery was an epistle from S. Patrick, pretending to have been written about 434, in Glastonbury, in which is given a list of the names of the clerics sent by Eleutherius to Lucius. The names, beside Phaganus and Deruvianus, are Brumbam, Hyregaam, Brenwal, Wencreth, Brantcommeweng, Adelward, Loyor, Wellias, Brenden, Swelwes, Hinloernius and Hin. It will be noticed that Saxon names are given among some affected to resemble British names. Patrick also has with him "Irish brothers" Arnulf and Ogmar, "qui mecum venerant de Ybernia." It is a composition of the twelfth century.²

As Schoell well says of the legend of Lucius: "Jam nihil, ut opinor obstat, quo minus hanc fabulam qua ad recipiendam Pontificis Romani auctoritatem inducerentur Britones, inventam esse post Augustini adventum censeamus." ³

Duchesne has made an effort to remove the discredit that attaches to the fable, but it is wholly vain ⁴; that it is a fable he is compelled to admit.

There have circulated other fables relative to Lucius, as that he was baptised by S. Timothy. A homily of the ninth century in the Library of S. Gall gives the following story. S. Paul sent his disciple Timothy into Gaul. Encouraged thereto by a Gaulish king, Timothy pushed on into Britain, where King Lucius ruled over a pagan people. Lucius summoned Timothy before him, believed, and was converted and baptised along with his family and a great number of his subjects. Later, he resolved on leaving his kingdom and preaching the Gospel elsewhere. He passed through Gaul, and visited Augsburg, where he was well received by the patrician Campesterius, and founded the first Christian community in that city.

¹ Ussher, Britannicarum Eccl. Antiquitates, Dublin, 1639, i, pp. 102-3. Ussher quotes with approval the judgment on this epistle by Bishop Godwin of Hereford: "De hac Epistola si me oporteat Sententiam ferre; non nimis profecto sapere seculum Eleutherianum confitendum reor."

² San-Marte, Gottfried von Monmouth Historia Regum Brit., Halle, 1854, pp. 272-3.

³ De Ecclesiasticæ Britonum . . . historiæ fontibus, Berlin, 1851, p. 24.

⁴ Revue Celtique, vi, pp. 491-3.

Then he went on into the Rhetian Alps. After fasting and praying for seven days, on the eighth he began to preach. When he learned that in the Masswald, or forest, were uroxen that were adored by the natives as gods, the Saint went thither and converted many heathen. Those who did not believe threw him into a pit and would have stoned him, but he was miraculously delivered. Then the savage uroxen came up and licked his feet. When this was rumoured in the town of Chur or Coire, the people came forth to meet him with torches and hymns. Here the homily breaks off, and we learn nothing relative to his death. This story was taken into the Breviarium Curiense, printed in 1490, and was read on the feast of the Saint till 1646. To the story was added that Lucius after his conversion had sent a deputation to Pope Eleutherius to furnish missioners for the conversion of the British. In 1646, the Church of Chur accepted the Roman Breviary, and lections from Geoffrey of Monmouth(!), but with additions from the Chur story; and Lucius, who had hitherto been culted as a confessor, was thenceforth exalted into a martyr.

Notker Balbulus, d. 912, inserted Lucius as a British king who came to Chur, in his Martyrology, but not without giving hint that he mistrusted the legend.

In the sixteenth century the story got expanded and altered. It was said that this Lucius was the Lucius of Cyrene mentioned in the Acts xiii. 1; also that the saint was stoned in the castle of Martiola, where now stands the cathedral.

Peter de Natalibus (d. before 1406) says: Lucius the blessed Confessor was a King of Britain; he was baptised by Timothy, the disciple of S. Paul; who having set his realm in order and tranquility; having abandoned the vanities of this world; and many having been converted to God through his agency, travelled through Augsburg and arrived at Chur, following the example of many seekers after perfection, and died on December 3, in peace."¹

But according to the Gesta Treverorum he was baptised by one Marcellus. There was a Marcellus, Bishop of Tongres, about 250, according to the list drawn up by Hubert of Liège in the eighth century—he was probably the same as the supposed Bishop at Liège about the same time.

At Chur is shown the Luciuslöchlein, into which Lucius and his sister Emerita retreated. She was seized by the pagans and burned to death at Trimmis.

The cave of S. Lucius lies about half an hour's walk from the town of Chur, high up, and Mass is said in it once a month. A small trickle of water in it is used by pilgrims as a cure for sore eyes.¹

¹ Catalogus Sanctorum, i, c. 24.

Thackeray, in the first of his Roundabout Papers, speaks of the statue of S. Lucius at Coire. "In the Cathedral—his statue appears surrounded by other sainted persons of his family. With tight red breeches, a Roman habit, a curly brown beard, and a neat little gilt crown and sceptre, he stands, a very comely and cheerful image."

Stow in his Chronicle says that the Church of S. Peter, Cornhill, London, was founded by S. Lucius, and he gives an inscription in that church testifying to this. Stow says "he was after some chronicle buried in London and after some chronicle buried at Glowcester."² Gloucester to-day claims his tomb.

Lucius of Britain, who sent a delegation to Eleutherius, is a purely mythical personage. Professor Harnack by his recent brilliant discovery, has shown that the mission must have been from Eleutherius to Britium of the Edessenes, between 174 and 179, when Lucius Aelius Septimius Megas Abgarus IX was King of Britium.³

We will now come to the form the legend assumed in Welsh. This is not a long-drawn story of many details. Moreover, it is confined to one corner only of Wales—to a small district with Llandaff as its centre; and it is here that the few threads of the legend were woven. Glamorganshire has proved fertile soil for the growth of these Christianizing legends. Those associated with Brân and members of his family we have already noticed.

Setting aside Geoffrey of Monmouth's Welsh Brut—a powerful factor in its formation—the legend is principally contained in the Iolo MSS. and the later Triads, and is, consequently, of very late date. Lucius is therein said to have been the son of Coel ab Cyllin Sant ab Caradog ab Brân Fendigaid, a mythical enough ancestry. This differs from the pedigree in Geoffrey's Brut, which makes him the son of Coel ab Meurig ab Gweirydd Adarwenidawg ab Cynfelyn ab Teneuan ab Lludd ab Beli Mawr, and so on up to Prydain ab Aedd Mawr, the first monarch of the Isle of Britain. His name is given under various forms, which are merely Welsh renderings of the Latin name—Lleufer Mawr, Lleurwg or Lleurwg, and Lles.⁴ The first form is explained by Nen-

¹ Burgener, Die Wallfahrtsorte d. Schweiz, Zürich, 1867, i, p. 314.

² For his association with London, see especially the note in Bp. Browne (of Bristol), The Christian Church in these Islands before the coming of Augustine, 1899, pp. 59-61.

³ Sitzungsberichte d. k. Preuss. Akad. d. Wissenschaften, 19 Mai, 1904; referred to in Y Cymmrodor, xxi (1908), p. 95. The origin and growth of the myth have been lately dealt with in the Analecta Bollandiana, 1905, p. 393, and in the English Historical Review, xxii (1907), pp. 767-70.

⁴ Lleufer means literally "light-bearer," like Lucifer and Phosphorus. We nius,¹ "Lucius agnomine Lleuer Maur, id est, Magni-Splendoris." He is mentioned as "King of the Island of Britain, who lived at Llandaff."² Having conceived a desire to embrace the Christian faith, he applied to Rome for teachers, and Eleutherius sent him Elfan, Medwy, Dyfan, and Ffagan.³ According to other accounts, the messengers sent by Lucius were Elfan and Medwy, and the Roman emissaries Dyfan and Ffagan.

A chronicle⁴ states: "Lles, also called Lleirwg Sant and Lleufer Mawr, sent for godly men from Rome to teach the Faith in Christ to the Welsh nation. He it was that first erected a church at Llandaff, and placed bishops therein, to administer Baptism to the Welsh nation. This was the first of our churches, and the most exalted in privileges. He also instituted schools there to teach the Faith in Christ, and a knowledge of Welsh books."

Again, "Lleufer Mawr gave property to Côr Eurgain (called after him Bangor Lleufer Sant) for 100 saints. He was the first king that established national order and law for the Faith in Christ, and he founded three sees, viz., Llandaff, Caerwryyl, and Caerfelyn."⁵

Again, "Lles ab Coel founded Llandaff, and the Rhath Fawr (apparently Roath, now a suburb of Cardiff), and many others of which the names are now not known."⁶

The two earlier series of the Triads know nothing of him, but he is mentioned in two Triads in the Third Series, of about the sixteenth century, wherein it is added that it was he who "first gave lands," and "bestowed the privilege of country and nation, judicial power and validity of oath, upon such as were of the Faith in Christ"; and on this account he is distinguished as one of the three "Blessed Kings (Menwedigion Teyrnedd) of the Isle of Britain."⁷ have the O. Welsh form in the loubet of the alphabet attributed to Nemnivus in a Bodleian MS. of the ninth century. Lleurwg is derived from lleuer. We should have expected Lucius to have assumed in Welsh, at an early period, the form Lluc, later Llug, just as lucerna, borrowed early, yielded llugorn, but, as a late borrowing, llusern. The equation Lucius = Lles ab Coel occurs for the first time in Geoffrey's Welsh Brut, in the fourteenth century Red Book of Hergest, where the Emperor Lucius Tiberius also appears as Lles. But, as Sir J. Rhys has pointed out to us, Lles from Lucius cannot be a direct Welsh borrowing. The Irish léss, lés, meaning "light" (the exact equivalent of the Welsh llewyech), is applied to Lucius in the Martyrology of Oengus (ed. Stokes), where, on March 4, we have "Lucius léss laindrech," "Lucius, a lucid light!" Lles = Lucius has, therefore, been derived through an Irish source, and that not a very early one. It is a name of rare occurrence in Welsh; the only other instance that we know of is in the Bleddyn ab Cynfyn pedigree in Mostyn MS. 117 (of the thirteenth century) and Cardiff MS. 25, p. 71.

¹ Hist. Brit., c. 18. ² Iolo MSS., p. 149. ³ Ibid., p. 115.

⁴ Ibid., p. 38; cf. pp. 40, 100.

⁵ Ibid., p. 149. ⁶ Ibid., p. 220. ⁷ Myv. Arch., pp. 404, 407.

One of "The Stanzas of the Achievements" ¹ informs us that—

The achievement of Lleirwg, the meek chieftain,
The son of Coel ab Cyllin the eloquent,
Was the forming of books, and the medium of learning.

To S. Lleirwg was formerly dedicated the church of Llanleirwg, later, Llaneirwg,² in Monmouthshire. It is now known as S. Mellon's, and the church in Latin documents has been called the church of S. Melanus since at least the thirteenth century. The parish church of the recently formed (1886) parish of Hirwain, in Glamorganshire, is dedicated to S. Lleurwg.

Attesting the apparent truth of the Lucius legend, there are, besides Llanleirwg, not far from Llandaff, ancient parish churches dedicated to three out of the four Christian teachers mentioned, viz., Dyfan, Ffagan, and Medwy. Elfan, who always pairs with Medwy, appears never to have had any dedication. We have Dyfan at Merthyr Dovan, Ffagan at S. Fagan's, and Medwy at Michaelston-y-Vedw, formerly Llanfedwy, the church of which was burnt down in the eleventh century, and was never rebuilt, but Llanfedw has survived as township-name. In this group Lleirwg and Medwy had, after the Norman Conquest, to make way for Mellon and the Archangel, which shows that their churches belonged to a fairly early period.

The Llandaff tradition would meet with little or no consideration but for this little cluster of dedications in the neighbourhood, of which none occur elsewhere. For all that, there can hardly be a doubt that these dedications represent perfectly historical persons, who, however, lived some four centuries, more or less, later than the second. The legend-mongers found in the locality certain dedication-names, which they guessed, from their similarity only, to be those in the story, and took them over, and amplified the legend to what we find it in those sixteenth and seventeenth century documents, more especially in the Iolo MSS.

The common centaur is called, among other names, in Welsh, Llysiau Lleurwg,³ which also occurs as Llysiau y Bleurwg; but they are "book" names for the plant.

S. LUDGVAN, Abbot, Confessor

THE parish of Ludgvan, near Penzance, in Cornwall, appears in Domesday as Luduham. In the Exeter Transcript as Luduam. In the Episcopal Registers as Ludewan (Stapeldon 1324, Grandisson 1330), or as dedicated to Sanctus Ludwanus (Bytton 1312, Stapeldon 1312, 1318.) Ecclesia Sti. Ludowanni, Brantyngham, 1382; Ludvoni, also 1382; Sancti Ludvone, 1383. This settles the sex of the Saint.

¹ Iolo MSS., p. 263.

² Llan Leirwc, Peniarth MS. 133, of 1550; Llan Lirwg, Peniarth MS. 147, c. 1566; Llan Leirwg, Jesus College MS. 13, of seventeenth century, and Myv. Arch., p. 750. For the loss of ll in Llaneirwg, cf. the Radnorshire Llanyre for Llanllyr.

³ Meddygon Myddfai, Llandovery, 1861, p. 204.

Mr. Copeland Borlase suggested that Ludgvan stands for Llan Ddwynwen, and was named after one of the daughters of Brychan. This is quite inadmissible.

Ludgvan is apparently Lithgean of Clonmore. His feast in the Calendar of Tallaght is on January 16, and the Ludgvan feast is observed in the week of the festival of the Conversion of S. Paul, January 25. Add eleven days to January 16, required to obtain Ludgvan feast O.S., and we have S. Lithgean's day, January 27.

Of S. Lithgean not much is known. He was the son of Laignech, descended from Cucorb, King of Leinster, and belonged to the clan of the Hy Cormaic, who occupied the country west of the Wicklow mountains on the borders of Wicklow and Kildare. The family cemetery is at Killeen Cormac, between Dunlavin and Ballitore, and is known to archaeologists as having yielded several Ogham inscriptions. His mother, Melda or Bronfin, was sister to S. Ibar, and he was related to S. Cuach, Ciaran's foster-mother, whom we have identified with S. Kewe, and S. Ladoca.¹ She was buried in the family cemetery at Killeen. More remotely, he was related to S. Fiacc of Sletty, the Cornish Feock.

Lithgean had six brothers, all saints, but the most important of them was S. Abban, of Killabban. The manner in which the whole family entered religion seems to point to its having been involved in the banishment of the Cliu Clan for having embraced Christianity, and to its being allowed to return on condition that the members embraced the ecclesiastical profession. We find a Lithgean also spoken of as brother of S. Achebran or Kevern and a son of Bochra. We must not take the title of son or brother too strictly. Whether these be the same or different persons, we have no means of judging. S. Lithgean had a foundation at Clonmore in the territory of the Hy Failghe or Ophaly, but it cannot now be identified.

He probably moved to Cornwall about the same time as the rest from Ossory and Wexford, for he belongs to that period. If the Clonmore, where S. Lithgean was, be the Clonmore near Seir Ciaran in the barony of Ballybritt, then he must have been a neighbour and intimate with S. Ciaran, and have been in close touch with his cousin S. Cuach. It is most probable that the same political reasons which induced so many to leave the south-east of Ireland operated on Lithgean.

Lithgean is not to be confounded with Laidhgean, of Clonfert Molua, who belongs to a much later period. This latter is, however, an interesting personage as preserver of a crude Latin hymn by Gildas, which he took to Ireland, and which is preserved, and is the only early specimen we have of Welsh hymnody. It has been published by Stokes in his Old-Irish Glosses.

¹ Colgan, Acta SS. Hibern, xvi, Martii, Appendix ad Acta S. Abbani, c. iii, p. 626.

The local tradition at Ludgvan is that the holy abbot brought a stream of water, from its source at a distance, to flow under the churchyard wall; and it was held that a child baptized in S. Ludgvan's water is miraculously enabled to respond at its own baptism. The stream still flows, and supplies the village with drinking water.

S. LUGHTIERN, see S. LEUTIERN

S. LUNAPEIUS, see S. JUNABUI

S. LUPUS, Bishop, Confessor

THE authorities for the Life of S. Lupus are:—A Letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (Lib. vi, ep. 1) to S. Lupus, and mention in other of his letters. A Life of the Saint written by some one who was acquainted with his disciples, in Acta SS. Boll., Julii v, pp. 72–82. A second, and larger Life, written at the end of the eighth or beginning of the ninth century. This cannot be trusted; Acta SS. Boll. Julii v., pp. 69–72.

A letter, purporting to have been written by S. Lupus to Sidonius Apollinaris, was forged by J. Vignier; see Havet, Questions Mérovingiennes, ii, in Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes, xlvi (1885), pp. 252–3.

S. Lupus was born at Tulle in Gaul, about the year 383, and was the son of Epirichius, a nobleman. He married Pimeniola, sister of S. Hilary of Arles, and spent seven years with her in great love and happiness. Then he retired to the island of Lerins, and placed himself under the direction of S. Honoratus. What became of his wife is not stated.

When S. Honoratus was made Bishop of Arles, he went to Macon, in Burgundy, to dispose of an estate he possessed there, and was preparing to return, when he was met by the deputies of the church of Troyes, which had just lost its bishop, 426, to announce to him that he had been elected to the episcopal throne of that Church.

In an assembly held at Arles in 429, it was decided to send S. Germanus of Auxerre and S. Lupus of Troyes to Britain to oppose the Pelagian heresy, which had greatly spread in the island. The history of that mission has been related in the Life of S. Germanus.

Lupus and Germanus remained only about a year in Britain and then returned.

Lupus saved Troyes from being sacked by Attila, king of the Huns, when Gaul was overrun by the barbarian horde, and he died in 479.

S. Lupus was a student with a fine library, and Sidonius Apollinaris held his literary judgment in high esteem. His eloquence seemed to his contemporaries to recall the golden age of Gallic rhetoric.¹ It was probably stilted and full of pedantry, for so only could it have met with the approval of such a man.

Lupus's name was at some late period rendered Bleiddian, or Bleiddan, in Welsh, and two churches in Glamorganshire are usually regarded as having been founded by him under that name, viz., Llanfleiddian Fawr, or Llanblethian, and Llanfleiddian Fach, or S. Lythan's. But there are difficulties in the way of these churches having been named after him; and, moreover, there is no evidence that either Lupus or his companion Germanus ever set foot in Wales. See what has been said under S. BLEIDDIAN and S. LYTHAN.

Whether, on his way home, Lupus halted in Goelo, in Armorica, we are unable to say, but it is remarkable that he should have a cult there; he is patron of Lanloup, and has several chapels. A fine fourteenth century statue of him is in the church of Pontrieux. His day in the Roman Martyrology, and in those of Bede, Hrabanus, Ado, Notker, Wandelbert, etc., is July 29.

There is also Mulew in the ...

S. LYTHAN, Confessor

ITHEL, the son of Athrwys, King of Morganwg, made a grant of Ecclesia Elidon to the Church of Llandaff during the episcopate of S. Oudoceus.² This is to-day S. Lythan's, a few miles from Cardiff. In the later additions to the Book of Llan Dâv,³ the church is called Ecclesia de Sancto Lythano (or Lithano); so also in the Taxatio of 1254, and that of 1291, but in the latter the name is printed Lychano, an error for Lythano. The inscription on the Elizabethan paten belonging to the Church reads, ✠ SAINCTE LETHYANS 1577. In the parish boundary, as described in the grant, is mentioned Hen Lotre Elidon; and Luin Elidon also occurs.⁴ The latter, as Llwyn Elyddon (or Elyddan), survived late as the parish-name.

¹ Sidon., Epist. viii, 11, §2. ² Book of Llan Dâv, pp. 157-8; cf. pp. 31, 90.

³ Pp. 283, 340.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 32, 44.

The parish is also known as Llanfleiddian Fach, to distinguish it from Llanfleiddian Fawr (Llanblethian), near Cowbridge. The latter, now dedicated to S. John Baptist, is called in various parish-lists of circa 1566–1606, Llan-Liddan, -Leiddan, and -Elidan.¹ The same name is clearly involved, which would to-day be Elyddon, liable to become Elyddan. Neither church can, therefore, be dedicated to S. Bleiddian or Bleiddan, which it has been the custom to regard as the Welsh form of the name of S. Lupus of Troyes. Of Elyddon or Lythan we know nothing, but he probably lived a century or more later than did Lupus. See also under S. BLEIDDIAN and S. LUPUS.

Browne Willis² gives September 1 as the feast day at S. Lythan's, but this is the festival of S. Lupus, Archbishop of Sens, who died in 623.

S. LLAMINED ANGEL

THE sole authority for this saint is an entry in a MS. of, apparently, the seventeenth century, printed in the *Iolo MSS.*³ The name is sometimes written Lleinod (or Llyminod) Angel. Possibly the compiler was led away by his epithet to include him. He was the son of Pasgen ab Urien Rheged, and brother of S. Gwrfyw. The Venedotian Tribes of Collwyn ab Tangno and Marchweithian traced their descent through him.

S. LLAWDDEN, see S. LLEUDDUN

S. LLAWDDOG, see S. LLEUDDAD

S. LLECHEU, Confessor

LLECHEU occurs in the late lists of Brychan's children as a son of his.⁴ He is said to have a church dedicated to him at Llanllecheu, in Ewyas—now mainly included in Herefordshire—which has not been identified. He is also connected with Llangan, or Tregaian, in Anglesey.⁵ In Peniarth MS. 178 (sixteenth century) it is stated that he was a saint at ¹ Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 919. S. Lythan's is not entered in these lists, but Iolo Morganwg inserted it as Llanfleiddan Fach in that in Myv. Arch., p. 748.

² Llandaff, 1719, append., p. 2; Paroch. Anglic., 1733, p. 199.

³ P. 128.

⁴ Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 119, 140; Myv. Arch., p. 419.

⁵ Myv. Arch., p. 427.

Talyllechau, meaning Talley, in Carmarthenshire; but this can only be an ignorant guess.

Llacheu, or Llecheu, was the name of a son of King Arthur, who was slain at the battle of Llongborth, and is celebrated in the Triads.

S. LLECHID, Virgin

LLECHID was the daughter—the only daughter, apparently—of Ithel Hael of Llydaw, and the sister of SS. Tegai and Trillo, who came hither from Armorica with Cadfan.¹ She is the patroness of Llanllechid, in Carnarvonshire, adjoining which is Llandegai. Capel Llechid, called also Yr Hên Eglwys, on Plâs Ucha, in the parish, no longer exists. Legend says that the stones brought to it in the day-time were mysteriously carried away in the night to the spot whereon Llanllechid Church now stands, a distance of about a mile. In 1780 the chapel was fairly complete, and some remains of it were to be seen until within recent years. Near its site are two fields called Cae'r Capel and Cae'r Bettws. Ffynnon Llechid, the saint's Well, still flows hard by, and is believed to possess curative properties. Many persons troubled with scrofula and kindred diseases used to repair to it. "So great was their faith in it that persons would call for a drink of its water when at the point of death."² Lewis Glyn Cothi, in the fifteenth century, swears by the saint's shrine, "myn bedd Llechid!"³

Llechid's festival is entered on December 1 in the Calendars in the Grammar of John Edwards of Chirkland, 1481, the Iolo MSS., and the Prymers of 1618 and 1633; but as the 2nd in Browne Willis,⁴ the Cambrian Register,⁵ and a number of Welsh Almanacks from 1602 onwards. Nicolas Roscarrock gives November 1.

S. LLEIAN, see S. LLUAN

S. LLEUCI, Virgin, Martyr

THERE are two churches in Cardiganshire, and one in Carmarthenshire, which are regarded as being dedicated to S. Lucia, but of whom ¹ Peniarth MSS. 12, 16, and 45; Hafod MS. 16; Cardiff MSS. 5 and 25, Myv. Arch., p. 427; Iolo MSS., pp. 104, 112, 133.

² Myrddin Fardd, Llên Gwerin Sir Gaernarfon, 1909, p. 169.

³ Works, Oxford, 1837, p. 183.

⁴ Bangor, 1721, p. 273.

⁵ Vol. iii (1818), p. 222.

nothing is known. These are Bettws Leiki and Llanwnen, in the former county, and Abernant in the latter. It is quite evident that they are not early dedications, but of the Middle Ages. The first-named was formerly known as Capel Bettws Leuci, and served a district in the extensive parish of Llanddewi Brefi, which has since been made into a separate parish. Llanwnen, which is now sometimes given as dedicated to "S. Lucia or S. Gwynen," is ascribed by Browne Willis and Meyrick to S. Lucia alone, with festival on December 13. But the festival of S. Gwynen also fell on the same day, and it is clear that she has been merely supplanted by S. Lucia in the dedication, most probably on a rebuilding of the church.

Lleuci, or Lleucu, is generally taken to be the Welsh assimilation of the name Lucia, but if so, it is not quite rule-right. The name would have to be a fairly early borrowing, before the c had become the sibilant it is in Lucy. But who may this Lucia or Lleuci have been? We are disposed to identify her with the Lucia who was one of the numerous companions of the famous British virgin and martyr, S. Ursula, who, with her Eleven Thousand Virgins, was culted at Llanygwryfon and, the now extinct, Capel Santesau, in the parish of Llanwenog, both in Cardiganshire. Llanwnen adjoins Llanwenog; and, moreover, in the contiguous parish of Llanybyther a large fair was held on their festival, October 21, O.S., and is still held on All Saints' Day and its Eve, which is popularly known as Ffair Santesau. Of this Lucia we have no information¹ beyond that she is stated to have suffered martyrdom, with S. Ursula and her fabulous maiden host, at Cologne in the fifth century, at the hands of the Huns. Her festival at Cologne is November 23.² In the Welsh Life of S. Ursula in Peniarth MS. 182 (c. 1514) "Lucia Vorwyn" is given among the eleven virgin saints whose names are mentioned.³

December 13 is the festival of S. Lucia, the young Sicilian saint, S. Lucy of Syracuse, who was martyred during the Diocletian persecution, 303. Two churches in England are believed to be dedicated to her, Upton Magna, in Shropshire, and Dembleby, in Lincolnshire. She would have been more likely to receive a cult in England than in Wales.

¹ It has been suggested that she was, perhaps, "Lucia the Happy" of the Félire of Oengus (Smith and Wace, Dict. of Christian Biography, iii, p. 744). But this was none other than the Lucia of Syracuse: "Lucia with splendour, whom thousands moved not." See the Félire, edited by Dr. Whitley Stokes (H. Bradshaw Society), 1905, pp. 59, 68, 260, and the index.

² Stanton, Menology, 1887, p. 510.

³ Pp. 281, 290.

S. LLEUDDAD AB ALAN, Confessor

THERE were two Saints bearing the name Lleuddad, the one of Armorica, and the other of Wales, and the two have been confounded together. The earlier pedigrees know nothing of the Armorican, Lleuddad Llydaw, as he is sometimes called. He was the son of Alan Fyrgan ab Emyr Llydaw, and, with many others, accompanied his cousin, S. Cadfan, to Wales.¹ He was brother to SS. Llonio and Llyfab. The Iolo MSS. make him a saint, or monk, of Bangor Illtyd, at Llantwit, and afterwards bishop in Bardsey. Rees² says that after the death of Cadfan, the first abbot of Bardsey, Lleuddad was appointed his successor. But this entirely confuses him with the Welsh Lleuddad, whose Life leaves no room for doubt upon the matter. He may, however, have gone with Cadfan to Bardsey.

S. LLEUDDAD AB DINGAD, Abbot, Confessor

THIS, the Welsh Lleuddad, was the son of Dingad ab Nudd Hael, of the race of Maxen Wledig, by Tenoï, daughter of Lleuddun Luyddog, of Dinas Eiddyn in the North.³ He was thus a cousin to SS. Kentigern

¹ Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 117; Iolo MSS., p. 133 (on p. 145 he is given as son of Hywel ab Emyr Llydaw); Myv. Arch., pp. 427, 430. For his father, Alan, see i, pp. 136-7.

² Welsh Saints, p. 221.

³ Peniarth MSS. 12, 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16; Myv. Arch., pp. 423, 427; Cambro-British Saints, p. 266; Iolo MSS., pp. 103, 113, 139. On p. 145 of the last work he is called Lleuddad Gwent; and at the other references it is stated that he and his brothers were saints of Llancarfan, who went in a body with Dyfrig to Bardsey. His name occurs under a variety of forms, but it is usually Llawddog or Llowddog in popular speech in South Wales, and Lleuddad in North Wales, or rather in Llein. Lewis Glyn Cothi combines both in a couplet in his cywydd to him:—

“Llowddog, fy llw a oddef, Lleuddad ap Dingad yw ef,”

In the Saint's Buchedd his name is given as Llowddoc and Llewddoc, but in the pedigrees always Lleuddad. Giraldus wrote it Leudocus; but the name is; usually Latinized Laudatus. The two fifteenth century bards, Hywel ab Dafydd and Thomas Celli, in their Cywyddau i'r Ugain Mil Saint, call him “Llewdad lwydwyd” and “Llewdad lân”; and Iolo Goch (Gweithiau, ed. Ashton, p. 389), “Lleudad llwyd.” The parish-name, Llanllawddog, was formerly sometimes spelt Llanllawddog and Llanllywyddog. The names of two lay witnesses in the Book of Llan Dâv, Loudoc (p. 237), and Loudoce (p. 150), would now regularly become Llewddog and Llewddogwy. Sir J. Rhys thinks Lou-doc, later Lleu-ddog, to have been a real name made up of Lou-, later Lleu- = Irish Lug, gen. Logo (later Loga), meaning the god Lug, and perhaps ultimately a hero or champion in a wider sense; and -doc, as in Doc-mail, later Dog-mael, Dog-wel. He regards Lleuddad as another genuine compound, to which there should correspond in Irish and Beuno. He had as brothers SS. Baglan, Eleri, Tegwy, and Tyfriog or Tyfrydog. His Life, Buchedd Llewddog Sant, occurs in Llanstephan MS. 34 (late sixteenth century), and there is a copy of it in MS. 104 (early seventeenth century), in the same collection. We give here the substance of his legend.

Dingad ab Nudd Hael, King of Bryn Buga, or Usk, was the father of twelve children,¹ all of whom served God. Llewddog declined his father's kingdom, and joined his eldest brother, Baglan, in leading a religious life, apparently in Carnarvonshire. He would continually disappear to some secret place for closer communion with God, for which he was wrongly aspersed by his brothers. Baglan bade Henwyn to take a bell with him and find out where he went. We next find him landed in "the Island of the Saints."² He was an entire stranger there, and Cadfan peremptorily told him that if he did not mean to stay he must clear out. Llewddog accordingly became a monk or canon of the Augustinian Order.³ This, of course, is a gross anachronism; and Bardsey was Benedictine.

When Cadfan felt the approach of death he "bade the community to take Llewddog for their abbot after him. Llewddog and his monks buried Cadfan, and he thereupon became abbot. The bishops of Wales were filled with envy towards him; and he joined their pastoral staffs into one staff at the place now called Bryn y Baglau (the Hill of the Pastoral Staffs). Then came Llewddog, with his bell in his hand and his canons, and made the sign of the Cross over them, and they became disunited. From thence he went to a spot where was a well, and took a bowl of milk and threw it into the well. Then he separated the milk from the water, which the others were not able to do. Whereupon the bishops were convinced that he was greater than they, and each of them gave him a portion of his land."⁴

Llewddog, now secure in the abbacy, "worked miracles like one of the Apostles" to the end of his days, when an angel appeared to him

Lug-dath, meaning he "of the colour or complexion of Lug." Mr. Egerton Phillimore, for eu = later aw, compares Breudi, the old form of Brawdy, and Leuwni, the old form of Lawrenny, which latter he thinks comes from Laurent-ius or Laudent-ius, the two names being doubtless convertible.

¹ Even the later genealogies do not give him as many.

² According to the cywydd by Hywel ab Dafydd, the saints in Bardsey sent him a request to come and preside over them.

³ So Lewis Glyn Cothi. We are to infer from a grant of indulgence, dated 1286, that Bardsey was the earliest "domus religiosa de tota Wallia" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, etc., i, p. 584).

⁴ Hywel ab Dafydd says that the staffs grew on the hill into one leafy tree, which, on Llewddog's prayer, were once more separated; but he does not say that they were the staffs of bishops.

and summoned him to Heaven. "Take whoever of thy monks thou choosest with thee," said the angel. "Then called he his canons before him, and said unto them, 'He that desireth to come with me shall come.' And they said, 'We will all come with thee.' 'Not so,' said Llewddog, 'the eldest only shall come with me; the rest must here remain serving God.'

"Three requests did Llewddog make of the angel. First, that his canons should die from eldest to eldest, whilst they kept the commandments of God. Secondly, that the soul of any person buried within that island should not go to hell. Thirdly, that so might it also happen unto him that should maintain the privileges of the island." The three requests were granted him.

On his death-bed he had a glimpse of the Beatific Vision. "And they heard the voice of the Most High God bidding him come, and saying, 'It is time that thou come to the feast with thy brethren, Llewddog, to the place where thou art bidden.'" And with that he passed hence.

The fifteenth century bard, Lewis Glyn Cothi, also wrote a short cywydd, or poem, in his honour.¹ It closely follows the prose Life, and ends by invoking Llewddog's blessing upon his territory (that chain of parishes) and upon his people; upon every yoke, and plough, and harrow; upon every ridge and furrow; and upon every seed-corn and tree.

Giraldus, in the twelfth century, knew something of the tradition about Llewddog's first request, for he says² that Bardsey, probably "from some miracle obtained by the merits of the saints, has this wonderful peculiarity, that the oldest people die first." This privilege of dying according to seniority is recorded by Higden, whose Latin doggerel was thus Englished by Trevisa:—³

At Nemyn in Norþ Wales A litel ilond þere is, þat hatte Bardeseic; Monkes woner þere alweic:
Men lyueþ so longe in þat hurste, þat þe eldest deiþer furst.

A late MS. memorandum tells us something more; how each oldest canon would watch diligently for "the hour the thief of this life would come"; how "God, Who is ever faithful, kept His covenant inviolate, until the monks ceased to lead a religious life, and wickedly profaned His sanctuary;" and how thereafter each one had, irrespective of age, to obey the uncertain call of death like other mortals. Religion has now ceased there, and ceased has the wonder too.¹

¹ There are copies of it in Llanstephan MS. 7 (sixteenth century), and Additional MS. 14,871 (written in 1617).

² Itin. Camb., ii, c. 6.

³ Higden, Polychronicon, ed. Babington, 1865, i, pp. 416, 418.

In Peniarth MS. 225, in the autograph of Sir Thomas Williams, of Trefriw, is given, written in 1602, in Latin, Welsh, and English, "the sy^me of the Jndulgences w^{ch} Laudatus & his successors obtained of the supreme Bishops of the Church of Rome, [which] are graunted to all peregrines or pilgrimes & benefactors visiting godly & devoutlie" the Island of Bardsey "by reason of y^e hardnes of saylinge & passage to the Jsle." They are assured that if any of them "should die by the waye they should not be damned." One of the indulgences is the following: "For euery tyme y^e pilgrimes shall goe about the churchyard of the xx^{tie} thousand Sainctes, & ther in eu'y wyndowe shall say o^f Lordes prayer they shall obtaine of o^r Lord mercifully a thousand & fyve hundreth yeeres." We are told that "when the feste of James thap'le & the feste of Sancte Laudatus the Abbate are celebrated vpon one & the selfsame Sondaye then . . . that yeere is cōfirmed a Jubilee by the Apostolical auctoritie in the same Jlande." The feast of Lleuddad, however, is some six months earlier in the year than that of the Apostle.

Three pilgrimages to Bardsey were believed to be of equal merit with one to Rome. The late Lord Newborough in 1890 erected a cross in the centre of the graveyard to the memory of the 20,000 Saints buried there.²

¹ This note, we believe, has never been published. We therefore append here an exact copy of it as it occurs in Additional MS. 19,713, fo. 21b (1592):—

"BARDESEYA.—Notet hic lector quoddam et mirabile et Sanctum & inter Mirabilia Wallie in Cronicis annotatum: ad primam autem Monasterii huius Insule fundacionem. dominus ipse deus qui petitiones cordis Justorum implet. ad deprecatum Sancti Laudati primi abbatis eiusdem Monasterii inuit pactum cum ipso sancto. Statuitque ei et miraculose confirmauit sibi et successoribus suis claustratibus ibidem sancte et religiose victuris in perpetuum: Certum et priscitum ordinem et successum (mirabile dictu) scriatim moriend: vide:icet quod eorum maior natu: vel etate grandeuior priusquam eorum etate minor hac luce discederet Sic autem poma prius nascentia, priusque ex tempore solis ardoribus maturata, Prius ab arboribus vindemiatur. Hoc mortis instinctu premonitus ipse maturior etate huius loci quisque canonicus vigilaret utique. qua hora fur huius vite venturus esset. vt omni hora preparatus a corporis ergastulo, fratribus valedicens eis in celum prevolaret. Istudque pactum ipse fidelis deus (vt quondam israelitis) irruptum seruauit donect claustrales predicti, religiose viuere desierunt, et sanctuarium dei ibidem stupro et sceleribus nefande prophanarunt. Ob id quidem hodie rupto dei federe. nunc minor: nunc maior, nunc eorum medius etate, incerta morte, incerto mortis tempore communi mortis Jure, hac vita defungitur, Cessauit qui religio et vita monachalis: cessauit et miraculum. Tu autem domine miserere nostri."

² Its west, north, and south sides bear respectively the following inscriptions:—

SS. Cadfan and Lleuddad have been esteemed the patrons of Bardsey Island.¹

There are four churches dedicated to S. Llawddog, viz., Cilgerran, in Pembrokeshire, and Cenarth, Penboyr, and Llanllawddog, in Carmarthenshire. They stretch eastwards of Cilgerran almost in a straight line, and cover an extensive district. The present dedication of Cilgerran is to S. Lawrence, which was changed, as in other instances, by the Normans, who probably chose S. Lawrence because his name somewhat resembled that of S. Llawddog.² On the border of the parish lies Cwm Llawddog (his Dingle) through which the brook Morgeneu runs, and his Holy Well, with a farm called from it, Ffynnon Llawddog, are in the adjoining parish of Bridell. A spot below Castle Malgwyn is called Pant Llawddog (his Hollow). Giraldus Cambrensis³ refers to the rock at Cenarth Mawr (i.e. Cenarth), that had been hollowed out by Llawddog's own hands as a cave-dwelling, and adds that the church there dedicated to him,⁴ the mill, bridge, fishery, and an orchard with a delightful garden, all stand together on a small plot of ground. At Penboyr, in a field to the south-east of the church, stands Tomen Llawddog, known also as Tomen Maesllan, a moated mound of about 120 yards in circumference, which is one of the highest altitudes in this part of the county, and commands a fine view. Ffynnon Lawddog is in a wood called Bron Llawddog, near the church.

In Lleyn, Lleuddad's memory is perpetuated by Gerddi Lleuddad (his Gardens), in Bardsey, Ogof Lleuddad (his Cave) at Aberdaron.

" Respect the Remains of 20,000 Saints buried near this spot "; " In hoc loco requiescant in pace "; " Safe in this Island,
 Where each saint would be,
 How wilt thou smile
 Upon Life's stormy sea ? "

¹ They are so associated in a poem by the thirteenth century bard Llywelyn Fardd (Myv. Arch., pp. 248-50).

² S. Lawrence Fair here, held on August 21 (now two days earlier), was at one time the most important cattle fair in Dyfed. Llawddog is now forgotten except in the topography (J. R. Phillips, History of Cilgerran, 1867).

³ " Habet [Teivi] et piscariam copiosam juxta Ki'garran, in summitate rupis cujusdam, Sancti Leudoci manibus olim exsculptam, in loco qui dicitur Kenarthmaur [al. Kanartmaur) . . . Stant autem simu', in angusto scilicet terre arpentio, ecclesia sancti illius, molendinum, cum ponte et piscaria, et pomerium cum horto delectabili." Iitin. Camb., ii, c. 3 (Opera, vi, p. 114).

⁴ It appears that in the Statute Book of the Diocese of S. Davids, temp. Bishop Iorwerth alias Gervase (1215-31), Cenarth Church is mentioned as " Ecclesia Sti. Ludoci et Novem Sanctorum de Canarlmaur " (Theo. Jones, Breconshire, ed. 1898, p. 492.) This designation opens up an interesting question, for which see what has been said by one of the authors in the Cymmrodorion Transactions for 1906-7, pp. 102-5.

and Ffynnon Leuddad (his Holy Well), on Carrog in the parish of Bryn croes. This is a walled well, of about four feet square, and was formerly in high repute for its cure of every manner of ailment in the case of both man and beast.

The festival of S. Lleuddad is given as January 15 in the Calendar in the Prymer of 1633, and by Browne Willis,¹ but as the 21st in the calendar in Additional MS. 14,886 (1643-4). The day observed at Cilgerran was August 10, the festival of S. Lawrence, on which a fair was held, O.S., and is still held on the 19th and 20th.

There occurs among the "Sayings of the Wise" the following—:²

Hast thou heard the saying of Lleuddad,
For the instruction of a morose man?
"Friendless is every loveless person."
(Digared pob digariad.)

S. LLEUDDUN, King, Confessor

AMONG the many Welsh and other saints whose protection is invoked in a poem³ for Henry VII is named Llowdden, who must be the "S. Llawdden, of Ynys Eiddin, in the North," who is entered twice in the *Iolo MSS.*⁴ as a Welsh Saint. This seems to be all the evidence for so regarding him; but though his own saintship is doubtful, he was the grandfather of several eminent Saints. Llawdden occurs also in the Life of S. Beuno⁵ as that Saint's grandfather.

The person meant is, more correctly, Lleuddun Luyddog ("of the Hosts"), of Dinas Eiddyn, in the North, that is, Edinburgh. He is the Leudonus of the old fragmentary Life of S. Kentigern, and the eponymus of Lleudduniawn, or Leudonia, the Lothians of to-day.⁶ He appears as Llew in Geoffrey's Brut, where it is stated that King Arthur gave the districts in the North that he had wrested from the Saxons to three brothers, Urien (of Rheged), Llew and Arawn. Llew had Lodoneis, that is, the Lothians. In the earlier Life of S. Kentigern he is also called Lothus, and is said to have been a "vir semipaganus," and King of the Picts.

Lleuddun was the son of Cynfarch Gul ab Meirchion, by Nyfain, daughter of Brychan, and the father of Denyw, or Denw, the mother

¹ Parochiale Anglic., 1733, pp. 189, 192.

² Iolo MSS., p. 258.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 314.

⁵ Cambro-British Saints, p. 13.

⁴ Pp. 128, 145.

⁶ Y Cymmrodor, xi, p. 51.

of S. Kentigern; of Tenoi, the mother of SS. Lleuddad, Baglan, and others; and of Perferen or Beren, the mother of S. Beuno.¹ According to Geoffrey's Brut he was also by Anna, Arthur's sister, the father of the celebrated Medrod and Gwalchmai, the Modred and Gawain of the Romances.

Lleuddun is said to have been buried near Dunpender Law, in East Lothian.

S. LLEUFER or LLEURWG, see S. LUCIUS

S. LLIBIO, Monk, Confessor

LLIBIO was, according to the Iolo MSS.,² one of the many sons of Seithenin, King of the Plain of Gwyddno, whose land was overflowed by the sea and now lies in Cardigan Bay; and they became saints or monks in Bangor-on-Dee.

But if the same person is meant, he was a disciple of S. Cybi, for he is mentioned as having accompanied him with nine others when he left Cornwall.³ Along with Cybi he went to Aran, to S. Enda, and remained there four years. Llibio is mentioned in the Life of S. Enda as being his disciple on Aran, but the Irish account makes him brother of Enda. The Sanctilogium Genealogicum makes Conall the Red and Aibfinn the parents of both Enda and Llibio.⁴

From Ireland Llibio returned with Cybi to Britain and settled with him in Anglesey, where he founded the church of Llanllibio. The church is now extinct, and the small parish which it served has been annexed to Llantrisant.

The festival of S. Llibio is on February 28, which is entered as his day in a good many of the Welsh calendars from the fifteenth century onwards, as well as by Browne Willis, Nicolas Owen, Angharad Llwyd, and others. In a short poem, Teulu Cybi Sant,⁵ he is mentioned among the dozen "seamen" who formed that Saint's "family," and who were nearly all Saints connected with Anglesey.

For the Llandaff hermit-saint of the name see under S. LIBIAU.

¹ Peniarth MSS. 12, 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16, etc.

² P. 141; cf. p. 144.

³ Cambro-British Saints, p. 183.

⁴ Colgan, Acta SS. Hibern., i. p. 712.

⁵ E.g., Peniarth MS. 225, p. 130.

S. LLIDNERTH, Confessor

IN two of the seventeenth century MSS. of saintly pedigrees printed in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ Llidnerth is entered as a Saint, the son of Nudd Hael, of the race of Maxen Wledig, and brother of Dingad ; but the earlier pedigrees know nothing of him. No churches are named as being dedicated to him.

We find, however, a S. Llidnerth, or rather Lidnerth, mentioned elsewhere. The sixteenth century Glamorgan bard, Thomas ab Ieuan ab Rhys, refers to a saint of the name in several of his poems that are preserved in Llanover MS. B. 23 ; thus, "Saint Lidnerth," "Lidnerth Abad," "Tir Lidnerth," and "Plwyf Lidnerth." From these expressions we gather that he was a non-Welsh saint, because he is "styled" ; that he was an abbot ; and that he was the patron of a certain parish.

Several of the Welsh calendars also enter a Saint of similar name against June 19, and he is always "styled." The calendar in the Prymer of 1546 gives him as Lednerth ; those in Mostyn MS. 88 and Peniarth MS. 172 as Lednart ; that in Llanstephan MS. 117 as Ledy-nart ; those in Peniarth MSS. 27 and 186 as Leonart ; and Welsh almanacks of 1729 and 1763 as Leonard. This leaves no room for doubt as to the Saint disguised under the Welsh-looking form, Lidnerth.² There were only two abbots bearing the name Leonard that we know of, and both were of the sixth century ; S. Leonard, abbot of Vendoeuvre, commemorated on October 15 ; and S. Leonard the Hermit, who became abbot of Noblac, near Limoges, and is commemorated on November 6. No S. Leonard seems to be commemorated in June. The latter named is the Leonard who, under Norman influence, obtained such popularity in England, where there are dedicated to him over 150 churches, all of pre-Reformation date, and distributed over 33 counties. The Glamorgan parish of which he was patron is Newcastle, near Bridgend, now dedicated to S. Illyd, but there can be no doubt as to S. Leonard having been its former patron.³ He was not a particularly favourite Saint with the Welsh as far as dedications go.

¹ Pp. 113, 139.

² Leonard is sometimes found spelt Leothenard, and Lithenard (Husenbeth, Emblems of Saints, 1882, p. xii).

³ G. T. Clark, Caritæ, i, p. 21 ; ii, p. 332 ; Birch, Margam Abbey, p. 193 ; Penrice and Margam MSS., i, p. 60.

S. LLONIO, Confessor

LLONIO LAWHIR, or Long-i'-the-Arm, was the son of Alan Fyrgan ab Emyr Llydaw, and brother of SS. Lleuddad and Llyfab.¹ He was a native of Armorica and came over to Wales with Cadfan and his company. His father also left Armorica, for, according to the "Triads of Arthur and his Warriors,"² one of the "Three Disloyal Hosts (Aniweir Deulu) of the Isle of Britain" was "the Host of Alan Fyrgan, which turned back from its lord on the road at night, leaving him and his servants at Camlan, where he was slain" (in 537).

An Ode, Owdl Llonio Sant, written in his honour by Huw Arwystli, who flourished in the sixteenth century, occurs in Llanstephan MS. 53, written circa 1647. It was whilst sleeping one May Eve in Llonio's Church at Llandinam, in Montgomeryshire, when on his travels, that the "poor despised cripple" became endowed with the divine afflatus of poesy. He begins the ode by exhorting Llonio's "parishioners" to invoke their Saint's good offices in the hour of death and in the day of Judgment, and then proceeds with the legend. A Latin chronicle, he says, recorded that Llonio had in early life assisted his father Alan in fighting the "Pagans" with great slaughter. After that he became "a righteous confessor." The "crowned one" left Llydaw for Wales, seeking the Kingdom of Heaven, and settled on "a delightful hill on the verdant bank of the Severn," at Llandinam.³ Gwrai (no doubt the son of Gildas, and patron of the neighbouring parish of Penstrowed) granted him land as far as the cock-crow travelled in circumference; and he proceeded to light a fire, to denote possession, but was met with opposition from the inhabitants. It nothing availed; and "Maelgwyn Hir" (probably Maelgwn Gwynedd) further conceded to him a tract of land extending along the Severn down to Abermule. Of this he granted a small portion (tyddyn) to Gwrai, and set the bounds of the remainder for his sanctuary. Here he long remained. The bard concludes by singing the glories of pleasant Llonio-land. Might he there abide while joy and love endured.

According to the Iolo MSS. Llonio was a saint or monk of Bangor Illtyd and afterwards of Bardsey, and was at one time periglaur or confessor to Bishop Padarn at Llanbadarn Fawr. The only church known for certain to be dedicated to him is Llandinam. The church of Aberhafesp, in the neighbourhood, is sometimes ascribed to him, but generally to Gwynog, son of Gildas. In support of its dedication to Llonio may be mentioned Maelgwn's grant, and the fact that the parish was originally "a part of the wide ecclesiastical district which owned Llandinam as the mother church,"¹ as evidenced by the Taxationes of 1254 and 1291. Another church sometimes said to be dedicated to him is Llanllwni in Carmarthenshire, but this is merely a supposition.

¹ Peniarth MS. 45; Hafod MS. 16; Cardiff MS. 25, pp. 37, 120; Myv. Arch., p. 427; Cambro-British Saints, p. 268; Iolo MSS., pp. 102, 106, 112, 132-3. Possibly the Cardiganshire place-name Llanio bears no relation to Llonio.

² Peniarth MS. 45.

³ The dinam of the name seems to be the same as the Breton place-name Dinan, "a little fortress." Cf. Dinan in Llangaffo, Anglesey, and Llysdinam, near Newbridge-on-Wye.

The festival of S. Llonio does not occur in any of the Welsh Calendars, but Browne Willis says² that the "Llandinam feast follows March 1."

According to the *Iolo MSS.*³ Llonio lies buried in Bardsey; and Lewis Glyn Cothi, in the fifteenth century, swears by his shrine, "myn bedd Lloniaw!"⁴

Llonnyo occurs as a place-name in the Welsh Laws,⁵ and has been supposed to be Lanion near Pembroke. By the same place is intended the Llonyon of the Gwrddfeichiaid Triad.

In the catalogue of Brychan's children in Peniarth MS. 75 (sixteenth century) a Llonio is given as a son of his.

S. LLORCAN WYDDEL, Martyr

THE church of Llanllugan, Montgomeryshire, situated in that extensive district of which Meifod was the head, is generally supposed to have been founded by S. Tyssilio, and is included among the Tyssilio churches by Cynddelw (flor. c. 1150-1200) in his poem, *Canu Tyssilyaw*⁶—

Llann a wnaeth ae lauvaeth lovlen
Llann llugyrn llogaut offerenn.

(A church he raised with his fostering hand, Llanllugyrn, with a chancel for Mass.)

This is the earliest spelling of the name that we know of. By the thirteenth century the r had dropped out. To treat Llugyrn as a common noun, and render the name, "The Church of the War-horns," as has been done, would be absurd. In our opinion, Llugyrn is simply

¹ Archdeacon Thomas, Hist. of Diocese of S. Asaph, i (1908), p. 507.

² Survey of S. Asaph, 1720, p. 290. ³ P. 133.

⁴ Works, 1837, p. 490. ⁵ Ed. 1841, folio, p. 544.

⁶ Myv. Arch., p. 178; Red Book of Hergest, col. 1165.

the Welsh assimilation of the Irish name Lorcan.¹ Metathesis is common enough in Welsh; tangnefedd—tangneddyf, salkwyr—llaswyr, etc. The person meant is, we believe, none other than the Llorcan Wyddel, or the Goidel, who occurs in two MSS. of the sixteenth century (Peniarth MS. 75 and Additional MS. 31,055) as the first named of six persons reputed to have been raised from the dead by S. Beuno, and is referred to as a "Scot," or Irishman, in that Saint's Welsh Life.²

When Beuno heard the voice of the hare-hunting Saxon on the other side of the Severn he left Berriew with his disciples, and came to Meifod, where they remained with S. Tyssilio for forty days, and then moved on to King Cynan ab Brochwel, who gave Beuno Gwyddelwern, in Merionethshire, "a place which received its name from the Scot whom Beuno raised there from the dead, whose wife had been the cause of his death. There Beuno erected a church," and afterwards left for Holywell. The legend takes Gwyddelwern to mean the Goidel's Marsh, or, possibly, his Alder-grove.³ The church is, and always has been, dedicated to S. Beuno.

When afterwards Llanllugan passed into the possession of the Church of Meifod it became, according to the well-known Welsh custom, a Tyssilio dedication, though still retaining Llorcan's name. As illustrating herein Cynddelw's poem might be mentioned the similar one by Gwynfardd, in which are enumerated the various churches in the thirteenth century that "Dewi was the owner" or, that is, were dedicated to him, among which are such churches as Llangadock and Llangyfelach. When Llanllugan, some time between 1170 and 1188, became a community for women of the Cistercian Order, in connexion with Strata Marcella, it was re-dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, after the practice of that Order.⁴

It is by no means improbable that to Llorcan Wyddel is also dedicated the church of the adjoining parish of Llanwyddelan, for we know ¹ It was a fairly common Irish name, and is sometimes found Latinized as Laurentius. For instance, the name, in Irish, of S. Laurence O'Toole (d. 1180), the first archbishop of Dublin, was Lorcan Ua Tuathail. Pen Llarcan occurs as a man's name in the Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 112. Ysgorlygan, or Scorlegan, is a tenement-name in the parish of Llangynhafal, Denbighshire.

² Llyvyr Agkyr Ll., ed. Morris Jones and Rhys, p. 121; Cambro-British Saints, p. 15.

³ Dr. Owen Pughe, in his Welsh Dictionary, renders it, "a moor or meadow overgrown with bushes."

⁴ Archdeacon Thomas, Hist. of Dio. of S. Asaph, i (1908), p. 484. Dafydd ab Gwilym in one of his poems (No. xi of his published works), after a passing allusion to "merched Mair" (nuns), says:—

"Dewis lun, dos y Lan falch, Llugan lle mae rhai lliwgalch."

nothing of the parentage or history of Gwyddelan, and his name, like the Gwyddelyn of the "Triads of Arthur and his Warriors," simply means "the little Irishman." We may mention, as affording some corroboration, that an especial characteristic of churches dedicated to disciples of S. Beuno is that they are constantly found in the vicinity of churches founded by their master, as shown by the situation of the churches of Aelhaiarn (his "acolyte"), Cynhaiarn, Llwhaiarn, and Twrog (his "amanuensis"). In the same district as Llanwyddelan and Llanllugan we have the two Beuno churches of Berriew and Bettws Cedewain.

Aelhaiarn was another person raised to life by Beuno, and had formerly a church dedicated to him at Llanaelhaiarn, the small parish of which has, for nearly four centuries, been annexed to Gwyddelwern. Guilsfield Church, in Montgomeryshire, was originally dedicated to Aelhaiarn, but, from its association with Meifod, has come to be regarded as under the invocation of Tyssilio.

Browne Willis¹ says of Llanllugan that its dedication is not known, "no Feast being kept here." The festival of Gwyddelan is August 22.

S. LLUAN, Matron

LLUAN, whose name occurs in the later documents as Lleian, was a daughter of Brychan Brycheiniog.² She became the wife of Gafran ab Dyfnwal Hên, who died in 558, by whom she was the mother of the celebrated Aidan mac Gabran of the Irish annals, known to Welsh tradition as Aeddan Fradog, or the Treacherous. Aidan was made King of the Dalriad Scots of Argyle by S. Columba in 574, being the first independent King of the Scots. He was an enterprising and aggressive king, for we find him making an expedition to the Orkneys in 579 and to Man in 582. He died in 606. In the Welsh *Triads*³ he is branded as one of "the Three Arrant Traitors of the Isle of Britain," because he deserted his own countrymen and went over to the Saxons. The others were Gwrgi Garwlwyd and Medrod; and the three were the cause, it is said, of the Welsh losing the sovereignty of the Isle.

¹ Bangor, 1721, p. 360.

² Cognatio de Brychan in Vesp. A. xiv and Domitian i; Jesus College MS. 20; Peniarth MS. 75; Myv. Arch., p. 427; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 120, 138, 140. Her name as spelt Lleian means a nun, or titmouse. In Peniarth MS. 178, p. 24, she is called Gwennlian. Frequently, in Welsh, Gafran is made to be son of Aeddan. The names are found first inverted, we believe, in the thirteenth century Bonedd Gwyr y Gogledd.

³ Myv. Arch., p. 405; cf. pp. 391, 406.

Lluan was the patroness of Capel Llanlluan¹ (or-lleian), the chapel formerly of a hamlet in the parish of Llanarthney, Carmarthenshire, but since detached and formed into a separate parish under the name Gorslas, with its church dedicated to her. Her sister Tybieu is patroness of the adjoining parish of Llandebie.

S. LLUDD, see S. ILUD

S. LLWCHAIARN, Confessor.

LLWCHAIARN was the son of Caranfael ab Cyndrwyn, of Llystinwynnan, in the commote of Caereinion, in Powys,² and the brother of SS. Aelhaiarn and Cynhaiarn. His name stands always second in order in the earlier Bonedds. He is therein stated to be a Saint "in Cedewain," represented in part by the present rural deanery of the name, in Montgomeryshire, where two of the churches dedicated to him are located. He belonged to a royal and illustrious family. His grandfather, Cyndrwyn, was prince of that part of ancient Powys which included the valley of the Severn above Shrewsbury. Cyndrwyn had a number of children, one of whom was the valorous Cynddylan, who succeeded him in his principality. All his sons, it seems, and among them Caranfael, were slain whilst defending the town of Tren against the Saxons. Caranfael's three sons, deprived of their patrimony, thereupon embraced the religious life, like so many others of the Welsh Saints under similar circumstances.

The Iolo MSS. state that Llwchaiarn was a Saint or monk of Bangor Dunod, that is, Bangor Iscoed, on the banks of the Dee. He lived in the early part of the seventh century.

His legend is told in a somewhat obscure poem, entitled Cywydd Llwchaiarn, Filer a Sant, o Lamyrewig (a poem to Llwchaiarn, ¹ It is so spelt in the Black Book of S. David's (1326), ed. Willis Bund, 1902, pp. 244, 256.

² Peniarth MSS. 12, 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16; Cardiff MS. 25, p. 34; Myv. Arch., pp. 421-2, 424-5, 427; Cambro-British Saints, p. 267; Iolo MSS., p. 104. The name Llwchaiarn means "Iron Dust," and it is curious that "iron" should enter as a component part into the names of the three brothers. The father's name occurs under a variety of forms. The earlier Bonedds give Hygarfael, but this is shown to be a corruption of Caranfael (Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, pp. 474-5). It stands for an early Carantomaglos. Llystinwynnan (or -wennan) is now probably represented by the township of Llysin, in the parish of Llanerfyl.

warrior and saint, of Llamyrewig), which occurs, among other MSS., in Peniarth MS. 100 (sixteenth century) and Llanstephan MS. 167 (early seventeenth century). It was composed by a local poet, Sion Ceri, in the early part of the sixteenth century.

He says the Saint was a son of Cynfael,¹ and first cousin to S. Beuno. At Llamyrewig, one of the Montgomeryshire churches dedicated to him, and celebrated for the miracles wrought there, was his statue in a niche, vested in episcopal habits, with hand up-raised in blessing; and here too, it would appear, lies buried "the blessed Llwchaiarn, the impetuous lion." When first he set foot here he heard the ringing of bells on a hill on the banks of the Severn, and on its ridge, overlooking the valley, he erected a church. Here he prayed in a hair-shirt nine months and nine days, kneeling on a cold stone, till his knees were bruised. He was granted nine petitions, three of which, the bard says, were for the special benefit of his people. He next speaks of him as "a great deliverer, a saintly warrior like unto gallant S. George," who also, like him, slew a dragon single-handed. With his pastoral staff he caused a hind to leap into a pool, without destroying which his people could not live.² He had two altars, that is, two churches, in the Severn Valley, at which great offerings continued to be made, and his territory, as a sanctuary, was not inferior to Bardsey.³

There are two churches dedicated to Llwchaiarn in Montgomeryshire, Llanllwchaiarn, and Llanmerewig, which represent adjoining parishes. The area of Llanmerewig is small, under a thousand acres, and its one township was formerly known as Llanllwchaiarn Isa. Llwchaiarn is the patron also of two churches in Cardiganshire, Llanllwchaiarn and Llanychaiarn, which latter was formerly also called Llanllwchaiarn. Both are on Cardigan Bay. The Saint's missionary labours were, it would seem, confined to these two counties.

We may gather that Llwchaiarn, like Aelhaiarn, was a disciple of Abbot Beuno, to whom are dedicated the neighbouring churches of Bettws and Berriew. Aelhaiarn is also associated with Montgomeryshire, as founder of Guilsfield church, which is not far distant from his brother's churches.

¹ This is one of the forms of his father's name. Llwchaiarn having been a bishop was probably a "flourish" of the mediaeval sculptor, unless he is to be regarded as bishop over his own llans, as was not infrequently the case.

² Whence the parish-name, Llam yr Ewig, the Hind's Leap, which appears earliest in the Taxatio of 1254, under the form Lamerewic. It is now generally written Llanmerewig, out of which an apocryphal Welsh saint has been squeezed ere this. There is a Llam yr Ewig also in Carnarvonshire, and another in Merionethshire, as well as a Llam y Carw in Anglesey.

³ Lewis Morris gives a brief summary of the cywydd in his Celtic Remains, p. 278.

Liwchaiarn's festival is entered as January 11 in the Iolo MSS. calendar and in the Demetian calendar (S), but as the 12th in the calendars in Mostyn MS. 88, Peniarth MSS. 187 and 219, the Iolo MSS. (again), and the Welsh Prymers of 1546, 1618, and 1633. Browne Willis¹ also gives the 12th as his feast in the two Montgomeryshire parishes, and the same date is entered as his day in Welsh almanacks of the eighteenth century. The earlier and most numerous calendars thus favour the 12th as his festival. Bishop Maddox (1736-43) in his MS. Book Z, in the Episcopal Library at S. Asaph, has under Llanmerewig, "to S. Merewitiz. Wake Sunday after twelvth day."

S. LLWNI, Confessor.

THE genealogies of the Welsh Saints know nothing of this Saint. He is the patron of Llanllwni, Carmarthenshire, in the Teifi Valley. In the Valor of 1535² the parish-name is spelt Llanllony, and in a parish-list of 1590-1,³ Llanllowni. The church has been conjectured to be dedicated to S. Llonio, and sometimes to S. Luke. Byarth Llwni, his Cattle-fold, is mentioned in Mostyn MS. 134, a name with which may be compared Buarth Caron, and Buches Tydecho.

The Saint's festival, Gwyl Lwni, occurs only in the Demetian Calendar (S), where it is entered against August 11. The only Saint whose name approaches Llwni commemorated then that we know of is Leonis, martyr at Augsburg, or more probably at Rome, on August 12. There is a Gwyl Lwni Bab (Pope) entered against September 16 in the Calendar in Additional MS. 14,886 (1643-4).

S. LLWYDDOG, Confessor

THIS Saint's name does not occur in the Welsh saintly genealogies, but he is invoked as one of the Saints of Anglesey in a poem written circa 1600;⁴ and in an Ode to King Henry VII the bard commits the King to the guardianship of Llwyddog, among a hundred or more Saints, mostly Welsh.⁵

Some have supposed him to be the patron of Llanychllwydog or

¹ Survey of Bangor, 1721, p. 361.

² iv. p. 411. ³ Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 917.

⁴ Yr Haul, 1882, p. 561. With the name cf. Gwen-llwyddog or -llwyfo, and Hafod Lwyddog or Lwyfog.

⁵ Iolo MSS., p. 314.

Llanerchllwyddog, under Llanllawer, in Pembrokeshire, but the church appears in old parish-lists as Llanachlwydo or Llanychlwydo ;¹ and it is generally regarded as being dedicated to S. David. Llwyddog is locally reputed to have been martyred here, or, according to another account, treacherously murdered whilst pursuing the chase, and to have been buried in the churchyard, where are two upright stones commonly said to denote his grave.² Fenton, however, states that they mark the grave of S. Clydog, also conjectured, from the church-name, to be the patron.³

Beyond his connexion with Anglesey nothing seems to be really known about this Saint. One of the "Verses of the Graves" in the twelfth century Black Book of Carmarthen runs :—⁴

The graves on the Long Mountain (? the Longmynd),
Well do multitudes know them—
The grave of Gwrien famed in war,
And Llwyddog, son of Llywelydd.

Llwydawc Gouynnyat was the name of a young boar which figures in the tale of Culhwch and Olwen, in the Twrch Trwyth Hunt, and was killed at Ystrad Yw, in Breconshire.

S. LLWYDIAN

THE Welsh saintly genealogies know nothing of a saint of this name, and there is the greatest probability possible that he never existed. The name is spelt Llwydian and Llwydion, and he is usually regarded as the patron of Heneglwys, in Anglesey, which is also sometimes called Llan y Saint Llwydion,⁵ meaning the Church of the Blessed Saints, out of which has clearly been evolved the Saint's name. In a poem written circa 1600, in which a number of Anglesey Saints are invoked, occurs the couplet :—⁶

Y Saint Llwydion tra dêl cof, Trewalchmai rhof yn nesaf.

The church was also known as Eglwys Gorbre Sant, Corbre or Cairbre being most probably its original patron.⁷

Browne Willis⁸ gives Heneglwys as dedicated to S. Llwydion, with festival on November 19.

¹ Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 916; Myv. Arch., p. 745.

² Arch. Camb., 1865, pp. 182-3; Westwood, Lapidarium Walliæ, p. 122.

³ Pembrokeshire, 1811, p. 570.

⁴ Ed. Dr. J. G. Evans, 1905, p. 66.

⁵ Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 912. Llanllwydan (or-en) is the name of a township of Llanfihangel y Pennant, Merioneth.

⁶ Yr Haul, 1882, p. 561.

⁷ ii, pp. 180-1.

⁸ Bangor, 1721, p. 281.

S. LLWYFO

IN the *Iolo MSS.*¹ is entered a S. Llwyfo, by whom is evidently intended the Gwennlwyfo of the Myvyrian Archaiology.² See under that saint's name (p. 197.)

S. LLYDDGEN

IN the list of Welsh parishes in Peniarth MS. 147 (circa 1566) is given under "Swydd Gydweli," Carmarthenshire, a parish (really a chapelry) called Llanllyddgen. In the parish-list in the Myvyrian Archaiology it is Llan Hyddgen. The chapelry was in the parish of Llangyndeyrn, and in the inventory of church goods taken by the Commissioners in 1552-3 it is given under that parish as "Saynt Lethgen is chaple."³ Of the Saint nothing appears to be known.

S. LLYFAB, Confessor

THIS Saint's name is written Llyvab and Llyuab in the pedigrees in Peniarth MSS. 16, 45 and 182, Lleuab in Hafod MS. 16, Llyfab and Lefab in Cardiff MS. 25 (pp. 26, 114), and Llynab and Llyfab in the Iolo MSS. The name, under the incorrect spelling Llynab, has been equated with the Lunapeius of the Book of Llan Dâv, a misscript for Iunapeius=Iunapē=Iunabui.

Llyfab was a son of Alan Fyrgan ab Emyr Llydaw, a brother of SS. Lleuddad and Llonio, and cousin of S. Cadfan, with whom, in company with many others, he came over from Brittany. According to the *Iolo MSS.*⁴ these "learned persons became Saints in the Bangors of Illtyd and Catwg, but went with Cadfan as Saints to Bardsey. Their churches are in Gwynedd, where they lived in great piety and holiness." Llyfab was "a bishop in Côr Illtyd, and archbishop of Llandaff" (confusing him with Iunabui). Of this probably the only correct statement is that Llyfab went to Bardsey.

¹ P. 144.² P. 426.³ The correct reading of the inventory is Lethgen (Evans, Church Plate of Carmarthenshire, 1907, p. 122) and not Dethgen, as given by us, ii, p. 353.⁴ Pp. 103, 112, 132, 134, 145; cf. Myv. Arch., p. 427.

S. LLYR, Virgin

LLYR FORWYN, or the Virgin, is nowhere entered in the Welsh saintly genealogies. Rees¹ gives a Llyr who was a son of Brochwel Ysgythrog, and there were several men who bore the name. Llyr the Virgin is known to us only through the Demetian Calendar (S) which gives the festival of Llyr Forwyn (as in the Cwrtmawr MS. 44 copy), and of Vrw (Urw) Forwyn, on October 21. It has also, on the same day, the Eleven Thousand Virgins.

To Llyr the Virgin (rather than to Llyr Merini) is dedicated the little Radnorshire church of Llanllyr yn Rhos, as it is given in the parish-list in Peniarth MS. 147, circa 1566. The name was reduced to Llanur, and is now generally written Llanyre, and sometimes even in such corrupted form as Llanhir. With the treatment of the name may be compared Llanleirwg, which later became Llaneirwg, and has now been supplanted by the name S. Mellon's. Browne Willis,² however, gives All Saints as the dedication of Llanyre.

There was another Llanllyr formerly, near Talsarn, in the Vale of Aeron, Cardiganshire. The name, now generally spelt Llanllear, is retained by a gentleman's residence. Leland³ thus refers to the mediæval nunnery there, "Llan Clere [with Clere corrected overline to Lleyr] a Nunnery of White Nunnes in Cairdiganshire upon the Brook of Ayron. It was a Celle of Stratflur."

S. LLYR MERINI

One late pedigree document printed in the *Iolo MSS.*⁴ includes Llyr Merini among the Welsh Saints, and attributes to him the church of Llanllyr in Gwrtheyrnion (in Radnorshire), another in Dyfed, and another in Cardiganshire. This is the only evidence there is for him as a Saint. He has been confounded with Llyr the Virgin.

The Iolo MSS., on the same page, make him the son of Einion Yrth ab Cunedda Wledig and the son of Meirchion Gul ab Gorwst Ledlwm. Skene⁵ identifies him with Masguic Clop, brother of Meirchion Gul, and gives him for son Lleenog as well as Caradog Freichfras. The

¹ Welsh Saints, p. 161; Myv. Arch., p. 57.

² Parochiale Anglic., 1733, p. 185.

³ Itin., v, fo. 13; Dugdale, Monasticon, v, p. 632; Taxatio of 1291, p. 276.

⁴ P. 123. With his epithet cf. the Marini-latio of the inscribed stone at Llandyssilio, Pemb. It is of the same origin and meaning, apparently, as the Latin marinus.

⁵ Four Ancient Books, i, p. 168.

sons of Einion Yrth usually named are Cadwallon Lawhir and Owain Danwyn; but some late pedigrees name also Llyr. In Buchedd Colleen, Llyr is stated to have been "married to Margaret, daughter of the Earl of Oxford," and Lhuyd¹ adds that he was "Earl of Henffordd" (Hereford). Other late accounts make him the husband of Gwen, daughter of Brychan, and of Tywanwedd, daughter of Amlawdd Wledig.

Besides Llyr Merini, we have Llyr Llediaith, Llyr Luyddog, Llyr ab Bleiddut, and others. The name Llyr is better known in Welsh as that of the god of the sea, or, in the bards, of the sea itself. It occurs in Irish as Ler and Lir.²

S. LLYWEL, Confessor

LLYWEL'S name does not occur in any of the pedigrees of the Welsh Saints, but in the *Book of Llan Dâu*³ is given a Iouguil, Iouhil, or Iuhil as the name of a disciple, first of Dubricius, and afterwards of Teilo. There can hardly be a doubt that the initial letter of the name is a scribal error for L, with which may be compared the Louan of the same scribe written in error for Iouan. Louguil was the original patron of the Church of Llywel, in Breconshire, which adjoins Lann Guruaet, now Llandeilo'r-Fân, a foundation of a fellow disciple, Gurmaet. The church is now regarded as being dedicated to SS. David, Teilo, and Llywel. In the thirteenth century it was called "Ecclesia Trium Sanctorum de Luel."⁴ Gwynfardd in his poem⁵ includes it among the Dewi churches. Llanllowell, in Monmouthshire, is also given as dedicated to Llywel. It occurs as Lanlouel in the Taxatio of 1254, but as Llanhowel in parish-lists of later date.⁶

Iouguil, and another disciple, Fidelis, were sent by S. Teilo to the court of Aircol Lawhir, King of Dyfed, to avert death by poisoning, and the two witness the grant the King made to the Saint as a thank-offering.⁷

¹ Parochialia, 1909, p. 12. A Triad makes Llyr the possessor of one of the Tri Charw (or Tharw) Ellyll of Britain; Mabinogion, p. 305; Myv. Arch., p. 409. He is mentioned in one of the Englynion y Gorugiau in the Iolo MSS., p. 264.

² For the Llyr names see Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, pp. 458-9.

³ Pp. 115, 126-7.

⁴ Theo. Jones, Breconshire, ed. 1898, p. 492. Giraldus, Opera, iii, p. 199, spells the parish-name Luel. Llywel is also the name of the commote; Bruts, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 410.

⁵ Myv. Arch., p. 194.

⁶ Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, 920; Myv. Arch., p. 750. See under S. HYWEL. Lanlouel in the fourteenth century additions to the Book of Llan Dâu, p. 321. There is a Lanlouel at Pleyben, in Finistère.

⁷ Ibid., pp. 126-7.

S. LLYWELYN, Confessor

THIS saint, generally called in Welsh Llywelyn o'r Trallwng, was the son of S. Tegonwy ab Teon ab Gwineu Deufreuddwyd.¹ Some MSS., of less authority, make him the son of Bleiddud ab Tegonwy.² He was the father of S. Gwrnerth, who is usually coupled with him, and also (according to the Iolo MSS.) of a S. Gwyddfarch, and brother of S. Mabon. He is said to have been a Saint of Bardsey. He is best known as the founder of a small religious community at Trallwng or Trallwm (meaning a quagmire), short for Trallwng Llywelyn or Trallwng Côch ym Mhowys, now known as Welshpool.

Llanstephan MS. 187 (circa 1634), p. 230, gives him as the son of Einion ab Bleuddud ab Tegonwy ab Theon o Gegidfa (i.e., Guilsfield, near Welshpool), and adds, "Rhodri Mawr's daughter was his mother. Llywelyn Sant was the captain (penteulu) of Rhodri's bodyguard." This puts Llywelyn, who is believed to have lived in the sixth century, on into the ninth century, for Rhodri was slain by the Mercian army in Anglesey in 877.

In the fourteenth century Red Book of Hergest is preserved a religious dialogue in verse, supposed to have been composed by S. Tyssilio, and entitled, "The Colloquy of Llywelyn and Gwrnerth."³ In its present form, however, it cannot be much older than the MS. in which it is found. For particulars as to this see under S. GWRNERTH.

Cynfelyn ab Bleiddud ab Meirion, of the family of Cunedda Wledig, is said to have founded a church at Welshpool, probably a little before Llywelyn's time;⁴ but Llywelyn and Gwrnerth may be regarded as having been for centuries the patron saints of Welshpool. The present parish church is dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary.

The site of their church or chapel has been definitely fixed at the corner of Clerk's Lane and Salop Road, and about two hundred yards east of S. Mary's Church. The field below it is mentioned as "Maes dan Gapell Sainte Lleu'n" in the will of Hywel ab Ieuan, of Pool, August 27, 1545; and again, as "maes dan y Cappell," in that of Gilbert Jones of Pool, January 11, 1616-7. The church was destroyed by fire on Christmas Day, 1659, and a drawing of the now demolished "Old Church" is in the Museum of the Powysland Club at Welshpool, and has been reproduced by Mr. Robert Owen in his Welsh-Pool and Powys-Land, 1894, from which we derive the foregoing information.

¹ Peniarth MSS. 12, 16, and 45; Hafod MS. 16; Llanstephan MS. 28, p. 72; Cambro-British Saints, p. 267; Iolo MSS., pp. 104, 129. The name probably represents an early Lugubelinus.

² Peniarth MS. 74, p. 35; Cambro-British Saints, p. 271; Myv. Arch., p. 427.

³ Col. 1,026; Skene, Four Ancient Books, ii, pp. 237-41. ⁴ ii, p. 243.

Llywelyn and Gwrnerth are commemorated together on April 7 in most of the Welsh calendars from the fifteenth century.

From them the speedwell is called in Welsh both Llyisiau Llywelyn (whence its English name fluellen) and Gwrnerth.

The protection of Llywelyn, among many other Welsh Saints, is invoked in a poem for Henry VII.¹ There is a small, but powerful, spring on Cae'r Gors, in the parish of Llangybi, Carnarvonshire, called Ffynnon Llywelyn, which was considered beneficial for the King's evil; but probably it was not named after this Saint.

S. LLYWEN, Confessor

LLYWEN, or Llewen, was one of the many kinsmen of S. Cadfan, descended from Emyr Llydaw, that came with him from Brittany to Wales.² The late pedigrees printed in the Iolo MSS. state that he was one of the "Saints and learned men that were, with Cadfan, brought to this Island by Garmon, who were Saints in the Bangors of Illtyd and Catwg, but went as Saints with Cadfan to Bardsey;"³ who, again, had "their churches in Gwynedd, where they lived in great piety and holiness of life."⁴ These statements are unsupported from other sources.

There is no church known as dedicated to Llywen in Gwynedd or elsewhere. Llewin is a place mentioned in the Englynion y Beddau.⁵ The Lliwen is a brook which runs into the Ystrad at Nantglyn, near Denbigh; and with the name may be compared that of Llyn Llywenan, in Anglesey.

S. LLYWES, Confessor

NOTHING is known of this Saint beyond the fact that the church of Llywes, or Llowes, in Radnorshire, takes its name from him, which church, in the Book of Llan Dâw,⁶ is called Podum Lluhess, and Lann Meilic ha Lyguess, "the church of SS. Meilig and Llywes." The name is spelt Locheis by Giraldus.⁷ He is mentioned under the form Lyuhes in the Life of S. Gildas by the Monk of Rhuis⁸ as having been joined by S. Maelog or Meilig "in the district of Elmail," i.e., at Llowes.

¹ Iolo MSS., p. 314.

² Llywen in Peniarth MS. 45 (in Peniarth MS. 16 the name is omitted), Llewen in Hafod MS. 16 and Lewyn in Cardiff MS. 25, p. 114; cf. also Myv. Arch., pp. 427, 430. The name is apparently the first element of Llywenfel, in the Breconshire church-name Llanlleonfel.

³ P. 103. ⁴ Ibid., pp. 112, 134. In these documents the name is spelt Llewin and Llywyn.

⁵ Black Book of Carmarthen, ed. Evans, 1906, p. 68. C 12 +

⁶ Pp. 149, 255. ⁷ Opera, i, pp. 89, 175. ⁸ Ed. Dr. Hugh Williams, p. 326.

bet breint. y Rwy Llewyn a Llewelyn
 Swydd y Llanlleonfel
 Llewelyn = Llywelyn

S. MABENNA, Virgin, Abbess

THIS Saint was one of the many daughters, or grand-daughters, of Brychan, who sought their fortunes in north-east Cornwall when expelled from Brecknockshire by the invaders from the north. She is not named in the Welsh lists, but is given in Leland's Itinerary and by William of Worcester.¹

The only church dedicated to her is S. Mabyn, on a wind swept hill, but with pleasant wooded vales in the folds of the upland country. The church tower is fine and serves as a landmark.

Unquestionably, the Saint did not plant herself on this bleak eminence, but made her cell in one of the combs that dip to the Alan or the Camel, probably at Treveglos (Tref-Eglwys), where is a holy well, a quarter of a mile north of the village. The place is better known now as Paul's Ground, from a family of the name of Paul having resided there in former times. There were formerly chapels at Colquite, Helligan, and Trevesquite.

Nicolas Roscarrock, who gives as her day November 18, says: "There used to be a hymn sung of her, signifying she had twenty brothers and sisters, whereof S. Endelient and S. Miniver were two."

The parish fair at S. Mabyn is on or about February 15.

S. Mabenna is represented crowned, and bearing a palm in one hand and a book in the other, in the Wives' Window at S. Neot. Mr. Copeland Borlase² assumed somewhat recklessly that the church was named after Mabon, the brother of S. Teilo. But the Episcopal Registers—Bronescombe, 1266, Bytton, 1317, Stapeldon, 1317, Stafford, 1415, Grandisson, 1330, 1340, 1362, etc.—with one accord, make the Saint a female; and the testimony of the S. Neot window is conclusive.

S. MABLE, Virgin

MABLE is mentioned in the *Iolo MSS.*³ as a Saint in Gwent, but without pedigree. Nothing is known about the Saint's history beyond the fact that the church of Llanvapley, in Monmouthshire, is under her invocation.

¹ i, p. 319.

² The Age of the Saints, 1893, p. 149.

³ P. 144. Cefn Mabley is the name of a well-known mansion on the Rumney in Glamorgan. A Welsh proverb advises, "Na chais bod yn Fabli cyn bod yn Lleucu." There is a variant of it, "Ceisio bod yn Lleucu cyn bod yn Fabli."

S. MABENNA.

Stained Glass, S. Neot.

S. MABON, Confessor

THE Iolo MSS.—the sole authority—mention three distinct saints of the name Mabon, which it will be well to treat under one article.

I. Mabon, the brother of S. Teilo, and son of Usyllt (Ensic or Enllech) ab Hydwn Dwn ab Ceredig ab Cunedda Wledig. He had a sister, Anauved, who was the mother of SS. Oudoceus, Ismael and Tyfei.¹ Mabon, like Teilo, was, we may assume, born in Pembrokeshire.

II. Mabon, the son of Tegonwy ab Teon, and brother of S. Llywelyn of Welshpool.²

III. Mabon Wyn, called also Mabon Hên, the son of Glas ab Glassog, of the race of Brân Fendigaid.³ His grandfather is connected with Gwynedd. The pedigree of this Mabon is altogether mythical.

A late catalogue gives a Mabon as one of the "Bishops of Glamorgan alias Kenffig."⁴

The Iolo MSS. ascribe the church of Llanfabon, in Glamorgan, to each of the three Saints; most probably it received its name from the brother of S. Teilo. It is therein further stated⁵ that "Maenarch, Earl of Hereford, built the Church of Gelligaer, and that of Llanfabon, in honourable memory of Mabon Sant." Browne Willis,⁶ unaccountably, gives the church as dedicated to S. Constantine.

The dedication of the Church of Rhiw Fabon (Mabon's Ascent), or Ruabon,⁷ in Denbighshire, is attributed to the brother of S. Teilo as well as to the brother of S. Llywelyn; most probably to the latter. It is now under the invocation of the B.V.M.; festival, that of the Assumption. Llanfabon was the name of a chapel, now extinct, on the Alaw, in Anglesey.

In the parish of Llandeilo Fawr, Carmarthenshire, are two manors, called respectively Maenor Deilo and Maenor Fabon, the latter of which, as the name of a gentleman's residence, is now generally spelt Manoravon. The name points to the presence of Mabon in the district, associated with his brother.

¹ P. 107; cf. Vita S. Oudocei in Book of Llan Dâw, p. 130. Mabon was a fairly common name formerly. A cleric of the name signs a grant to Llandaff, emp. Bp. Catgaret (ibid., p. 209). A Mabon was bishop of Léon; and there is a Ker-mabon in Morbihan. Peniarth MS. 118 gives it as the name of one of the four "Giants" of Llansawyl, in Carmarthenshire.

² Iolo MSS., p. 129.

³ Ibid., pp. 116, 136.

⁵ P. 148.

⁴ Ibid., p. 361; Liber Landavensis, 1840, p. 625.

⁶ Llandaff, 1719, append., p. 1; Paroch. Angl., 1733, p. 198. We have not been able to identify Llanfabon y Fro, Glamorgan; possibly it is Gileston (S. Giles).

⁷ For the loss of the F cf. Bodorgan, Llanor, Llanol, etc. A proverb says, "Gwrach a vydd marw etto yn Rhiw Vabon" (Myv. Arch., p. 848), "A witch will die yet in Ruabon."

The following is one of the "Sayings of the Wise" triplets:—¹

Hast thou heard the saying of Mabon,
 Whilst giving instruction to his sons?
 "There is no searcher of the heart but God," Ond Duw nid chwiliwr calon).

This Mabon was in all probability S. Teilo's brother.

The name Mabon means a boy, or youth; in Old Welsh it would be Maponos, which, as Apollo Maponos, occurs as the name of the Celtic sun-god, in whose honour three inscriptions have been discovered in the north of England. He is probably to be identified with the Mabon ab Modron of the story of Culhwch and Olwen. Sir J. Rhys² remarks of the Mabon Saints, "It is quite possible that one or another of them is simply Apollo Maponos in a Christian garb."

S. MACHES or MACHUTA, Virgin, Martyr

THE following notice of this Saint appears in the Iolo MSS.:³ "S. Maches, at Merthyr Maches, where she was slain, was a daughter of Gwynllyw ab Glywys ab Tegid, and sister to Catwg of Llanancarfan. S. Maches gave alms to every poor person who asked it; and a pagan Saxon, in the guise of a beggar, went to the place where he knew she gave alms, and stabbed her in the breast with a knife."

Her father, Gwynllyw Filwr, was regulus of Gwynllywg, the district lying between the Usk and Rummey rivers, and was married to Gwladys, daughter of Brychan, by whom he had a large family.

The place at which she suffered martyrdom is now known as Llanvaches, near Caerwent, in Monmouthshire, but the church is usually said to be dedicated to S. Dubricius. The grant to Llandaff of Merthyr Maches, made during the episcopate of Catguaret, the reputed seventeenth bishop, occurs in the Book of Llan Dâw.⁴

The virgin martyr Machuta, mentioned in the Life of S. Tathan,⁵ is, no doubt, to be identified with S. Maches, though the story of her death is differently related. It is not stated whose daughter she was. She shepherded a flock of sheep, and a couple of thieves were desirous

¹ Iolo MSS., p. 255.

² Celtic Britain, 1904, p. 308.

³ P. 131.

⁴ P. 211. Tomos Derllysg, in a poem to S. Margaret (Llanover MS., B. 1, fo. 59 a), associates that Saint with Llanvaches:—

"Llyma verch lle mae i vëdd Llann vaches llaian vychedd."

⁵ Vita S. Tatheï, ed. H. Idris Bell, Bangor, 1909, pp. 10–11; Cambro-British Saints, pp. 261–2. With the name cf. Machutus = Malo.

to steal a fine three-year-old ram belonging to it, but were unable to effect their purpose without her knowledge. One day they constrained her to enter with her flock into a forest, and there they smote off her head, so that it might not be made known who had committed the theft. S. Tathan hearing of this was much grieved; but the two thieves, struck with compunction, came to him and confessed all. They described the place of murder, and on the spot Tathan raised a church in her honour. He caused her body to be "borne unto Caerwent, and it was buried there in the floor of the church."

S. MACHRAITH, Confessor

NOTHING is known of the parentage of Machraith, Machraeth or Machreth,¹ and next to nothing of his history. There are two churches dedicated to him, Llanfachraith, in Anglesey, and another of the same name in Merionethshire.

Cell Fachraith, his cell, is in Cwm yr Eglwys, above the church of Llanfachraith, Merionethshire, and a neighbouring farm derives its name from it. It is traditionally said that S. Gwynog once visited Machraith here, when he caused a crystal spring of healing properties to issue forth near the church, over which Capel Gwynog was afterwards raised. The well is still known as Ffynnon y Capel.²

Browne Willis³ gives his festival as January 1, and renders the church-name "Fanum Sancti Macariti."

S. MACHU, MACHUTUS, or MACLOVIUS, see S. MALO

S. MACMOIL, Abbot, Confessor

WE have identified this Saint⁴ with the great Irish abbot, S. Cainnech (in Welsh, Cennech), better known as S. Canice. He was named ¹ The correct spelling is Machraith or Machreth. It occurs in Myv. Arch. p. 284, under the mediaeval form Machreith. Leland, Collect., 1774, iv, p. 87, identifies the name with Macharius. There is an English Lake-district surname, Mackreth, but there is nothing to show that it is in any way related to Machraith.

² Taliesin, Ruthin, 1859, p. 136.

³ Bangor, 1721, pp. 277, 279. So also Nicolas Owen, Hist. of Anglesey, 1775, p. 59.

⁴ See ii, pp. 56-61.

Mac Moil from his mother Mell, or Melda. He is mentioned in the Life of S. Cadoc, whose disciple he was, and one of his favourite ones. We add here the few Welsh particulars relating to him under the name Macmoil.

At the rebuilding of the monastery at Lllancarfan,¹ Cadoc sent all the monks and others, excepting the two youths, Finian and Macmoil, to fetch timber for the work. These two he allowed to go on with their studies. But the steward, the cook, and the sexton, observing that they had not gone with the others, roundly rated them for "eating the bread of idleness." The youths were at the time reading a book called Cób Cadduc, "Cadoc's Memory." This they left open, and ran and tamed a couple of stags, which "brought home a great beam fastened to their yoke, which four powerful oxen could scarcely draw." Cadoc, on being told, cursed the three men for their officiousness.²

Cadoc made a present to Macmoil of one of the three stone altars in his monastery which he had received from Jerusalem; ³ and, further, built for him a church, "walled securely," so that "therein he might be entertained when he should go to Gwent and return thence; and he ordained Macmoil prior therein." ⁴ This church is known to be the capella on Cefn Mamoel, in the parish of Bedwellty, Monmouthshire. It is called in a record of 1101-7, "Ecclesia de Massmoil," ⁵ and is probably commemorated by a house close by Pentre Mamoel, called Ty'r Capel.

S. MADOG AB GILDAS, Bishop, Confessor

THIS Saint is identical with Aidan, son of Gildas ab Caw, with whom we have already dealt.⁶ A confusion has arisen in the genealogies, owing to his name having the two forms of Aidan and Madog.⁷

¹ Cambro-British Saints, p. 38. His name is written Macmoil and Mac Moilus. Brut y Tywysogion, s.a. 1070, records the slaughter of "Macmael Nimbo, the most renowned, and most powerful king of the Goidels."

² A similar story occurs in Vita S. Maidoci in Colgan, Acta SS., p. 209.

³ Cambro-British Saints, p. 42.

⁴ Ibid., p. 88.

⁵ Ibid., p. 385. In a carta, c. 1102, printed in G. T. Clark, Cartæ, i, p. 2, it occurs as "Ecclesia de Mapmoil." The name is sometimes spelt Mamhole.

⁶ i, pp. 116-26. Madog, i.e. Maedoc, stands for Mo-Aed-oc, in accordance with a well-known method of forming Irish pet names. Cf. Mocholmoc for Colman; Moronoc for Ronan, etc.

⁷ His pedigree occurs only in the Iolo MSS., pp. 83, 108, 137, 146, 156. He is stated to have been a saint of his brother Cenydd's Côr, at Llangenydd. He is the Maidocus mentioned in the Life of S. Teilo (Book of Llan Dâu, p. 101).

Aidan is given as son of Caw, and Madog as son of Gildas, and therefore grandson of Caw.

There are dedicated to the Saint, under the name Madog, the churches of Llanmadoc, in West Gower, and Haroldston West, and Nolton, in Pembrokeshire. To these must be added the now extinct Llanfadog, in the parish of Llansantffraid Cwmdeuddwr (for short, Cwmtoyddwr), Radnorshire. It is mentioned in the Harley MS. 1249, as "Capella Sancti Madoci," in an agreement, dated 1339, between Bishop Gower, of S. David's, and the Abbot of Strata Florida.¹ It stood on the banks of the Elan, on a farm called Llanfadog, where are still some mounds which mark its site. Near it are Nant Madog and Coed y Mynach. Browne Willis² ascribes to Madog also Llanbadoc, in Monmouthshire, but the early spellings of the name point to a S. Padoc. Possibly Kilmadock, in Scotland, is dedicated to a Welsh S. Madog;³ maybe a pupil of S. Kentigern, at Llanelwy, who accompanied him north. There is a Ffynnon Fadog in Llanfair Caereinion, and another in Llanddoged, in North Wales.

The Gwyl Mabsant, or Patronal Festival, is observed at Llanmadoc on November 12. One feature of it "was, and is still, a particular sort of pie, made of chopped mutton and currants. According to an old Gower custom, every farmer endeavoured to sow his wheat on or before Llanmadoc Mabsant, for the old people used to say that whatever was sown after then would lie in the ground forty days before it began to spring."⁴

S. MADOG AB OWAIN, Confessor

OF this Saint nothing further is known, except that he was son of Owain Finddu ab Macsen Wledig;⁵ indeed the evidence for his saintship is of the feeblest possible. Owain, his father, was the prince who repudiated the taxes hitherto paid to the Roman exchequer.

S. MADOG MORFRYN, Confessor

THIS Madog was son of Morydd ab Mor ab Ceneu ab Coel, and was

¹ S. W. Williams, Strata Florida, London, 1889, p. 158; Jonathan Williams, Radnorshire, ed. 1905, Brecon, p. 137.

² Paroch. Anglic., 1733, p. 206. In the Taxatio of 1254 it is spelt Lanmadok.

³ Skene, Celtic Scotland, ed. 1887, ii, p. 193.

⁴ J. D. Davies, West Gower, Swansea, Pt. ii (1879), p. 7. See p. 66 for a description and illustration of an ancient quadrangular bell ploughed up in a field in Llanmadoc.

⁵ Iolo MSS., pp. 113, 138.

of Llantwit Major. The sole authority for him as a Welsh Saint is a late document printed in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ He was the father of the bard, Myrddin Wyllt. According to a Triad in the Third Series,² Madog Morfryn, "in Côr Illtyd," was one of the three "Holy Bachelors (Gwynfebydd) of the Isle of Britain," the other two being SS. Catwg and Deiniol, and the three were bards. The son of Morydd we may certainly include among the apocryphal Saints.

S. MADOG the Pilgrim, Confessor

MADOG, called by the Irish Matoc Ailither, or the Pilgrim, was of British parentage. His father was a Welsh prince. His mother was Deichter, daughter of Muircadhach Maiderg, King of Uladh, who died in 479.³ Madog's brother was Bishop Sanctan. Madog was the first to come to Ireland, and he settled in an island called after him in the Lake of Templeport, County Leitrim. Thither came Sanctan, from Clonard, and during his journey is supposed to have composed a hymn that is found in the Liber Hymnorum, the recitation of which was supposed by him to preserve him from all dangers, and to ensure his being favourably received by his brother into his Community.⁴

The father of Madog and Sanctan was Sawyl Benisel,⁵ but which of the princes of this name we are unable to say. One of that name was the father of S. Asaph, and brother of Arddun, the wife of Brochwel Ysgythrog, who died about 610; consequently this Sawyl cannot have been the father of Sanctan and Madog.

Matoc Ailither is commemorated on April 25 in the Martyrologies of Donegal, Tallaght, and O'Gorman.

S. MADRON, Abbot, Confessor

In Bishop Bronescombe's Register, 1276, the patron of S. Madron, in Cornwall, is called Maternus. In Stapeldon's Register, 1309, he

¹ P. 127. ² Myv. Arch., p. 409.

³ Félice of Oengus, ed. Stokes, p. lxxxv.

⁴ Liber Hymnorum, ed. H. Bradshaw Society, ii, p. 47.

⁵ In Félice of Oengus, p. lxxxv, "Mac do Samuel chendisel." Samuel = Sawyl.

is Madernus; so also in Grandisson's, 1344, 1349, 1363; and in Stafford's, 1407.

The object of the Bishops of Exeter was to transform a local saint of the Celtic Church into one who had a place in the Roman Calendar. So at S. Madron, they converted the original founder into Maternus, Bishop of Treves, a reputed disciple of S. Peter, but actually belonging to the third century. Madron, however, is the Irish Medran, a favourite pupil of S. Ciaran of Saighir.

Medran and his brother Odran were natives of Muskerry, and came as boys, of from ten to fourteen, to Ciaran to consult him relative to a pilgrimage they had desired to undertake. When, however, Medran saw the venerable abbot, a waft of common sense came over him, and he thought it would be a much better course for him and his brother to remain with Ciaran, and enter into his school. When Medran proposed this to Odran, the latter was indignant. "This," said he, "is not according to the agreement wherewith we started from home." Then Odran, turning to Ciaran, said, "I pray you, do not back up my brother against me."

"The Lord judge between you both," said the Abbot. "Let Medran hold a lantern in his hand, and blow at the wick; if it kindles, then he shall stay with me."

Then, according to the story, the candle flamed up, and Medran attached himself to Ciaran.¹ This method of determining a course, by breathing on the still-smouldering snuff of a recently extinguished light, occurs in other stories.

Odran went on his way sorrowful, and travelled far, but eventually returned, and is probably the Saint of Lanhydroc. The name Odr, or Huydr, takes after it indiscriminately the diminutive an or oc, and becomes either Odran or Hydroc, like Aedh, which becomes Aedan or Mo-Aedoc.

The Irish have no record of the death of Medran. It is therefore probable that he accompanied his master to Cornwall, and there continued till he died. His name occurs in the Irish Martyrologies on June 6.²

He is not to be confounded with another saint of the same name, who was a disciple of S. Comgall, and is commemorated on September 15 in the Scottish Calendars.

The Feast at S. Madron is on May 17, which is the day following the commemoration of his brother Odran.

¹ Beatha Ciarain Saighre, ed. Mulcahy, Dublin, 1895, c. xxx.

² Mart. Donegal, and Duaid MacFirbiss.

The two boys came to Ciaran about 480.¹ We may suppose that Madron died about 540.²

S. Madron's Well was formerly famous for the miraculous cures supposed to be effected by the water. At the present time the people go in crowds to the well on the first Sunday in May, when the Wesleyans hold a service there, and a sermon is preached, after which divination goes on by dropping pins, pebbles, and little crosses of rush-pith into the water.

S. Madron should be represented as an abbot holding a lighted lamp or lantern.

S. MADRUN, Widow

MADRUN, or Madryn, was the daughter of Vortimer, or Gwrthefyr Fendigaid,³ and wife of Ynyr Gwent, regulus of that portion of Monmouthshire which lies on the east side of the Usk. Its capital was Caerwent. Her sister Anne was married to Cynyr, of Caer Gawch, and mother of S. Non. Madrun had as children, Ceidio, Iddon, Cynheiddon, and Tegiwg. According to other accounts she was sometime also married to Gwgon Gwron, by whom she was the mother of S. Cedwyn.⁴

Her daughter Tegiwg fell in love with a young carpenter engaged in building a palace for her father. The king was vastly incensed, but the girl was headstrong, and the parents had to give way. The carpenter, however, was not so amorous as Tegiwg, or felt overwhelmed with the honour, and being ashamed, we are told, at having only a humble home to which to conduct her, he cut off her head and left her. But S. Beuno raised her to life again. The young wife then retired from the world and embraced the religious life.⁵

Ynyr received S. Tathan, an Irish Saint, and settled him at Caerwent, where he formed a college, and became the ecclesiastical director to the king and his family.⁶

Tathan's holy life and teaching must have deeply impressed Madrun.

¹ Rev. J. Hogan, S. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory, Kilkenny, 1876, p. 164, puts the date as 462 or 463, but he labours to make Ciaran a pre-Patrician bishop.

² The Four Masters give 548 as the date of the death of his brother Odran.

³ Peniarth MSS. 16 and 45; Hafod MS. 16; Cambro-British Saints, pp. 268, 271; Iolo MSS., pp. 129, 138; Myv. Arch., pp. 422-3. The name represents the Latin Matronia.

⁴ See ii, p. 98.

⁵ Llyfr Ancr, p. 125; Cambro-British Saints, p. 19.

⁶ Cambro-British Saints, p. 257.

S. MADRUN.

Formerly at Madryn, Pwllheli.

For what follows we have only popular tradition.

In the troubles that ensued on the bad government of Vortigern, and the wrath of the Britons against him for having introduced the Saxons into the country, that prince was compelled to fly from his own insurgent subjects, and took refuge in a valley under The Rivals, in Carnarvonshire, where he had a dun of wood. If any reliance whatever may be placed on the History of Nennius, then S. Germanus was a strong motive power in causing the rebellion, but at the head of the revolted Britons was Aurelius Ambrosius.

According to the legend, Madrun was with her grandfather, and had with her her eldest child, Ceidio, when the wooden castle was surrounded and set on fire. Vortigern perished in the flames, according to one account, but Madrun fled with Ceidio in her arms to Carn Fadryn (1,217 feet), a solitary hill crowned by rocks, and there sheltered. Afterwards Ceidio founded a church below, at Ceidio, and the Lord of Madryn has right of presentation to it. At Madryn Castle, nestling under the hill, there was a fine piece of statuary, in white marble, representing Madrun with Ceidio in her arms.¹

The troubles of her native land probably caused Madrun to take refuge in Cornwall.

Madrun is regarded as foundress of the Church of Trawsfynydd, Merionethshire. Browne Willis² gives her day there as June 9.

Madrun is known in Cornwall as S. Materiana, and her day, according to William of Worcester, is April 9. He incorrectly calls her Virgo. Her father, Vortimer, died about 457, and her grandfather Vortigern about 464, and we may suppose that Madrun died in the first years of the succeeding century.

Dedications to her in Cornwall are:—The parish Church of Tintagel, and Minster, near Boscastle, where her body lay. Tintagel feast is on October 19, and Minster feast on April 9.

S. MAEL, Confessor

MAEL was a kinsman of S. Cadfan, descended from Emyr Llydaw, and came hither from Armorica with that Saint, also Sulien, and many others.¹ The late documents printed in the *Iolo MSS.*² state that they were "Saints in the Bangors of Illtyd and Catwg, and went with Cadfan as Saints to Bardsey. Their churches are in Gwynedd, where they lived in great piety and holiness of life." Mael is usually coupled with Sulien; maybe they were brothers.

¹ It was bought at the Madryn Sale, in 1910, by Col. Lloyd Evans, Broom Hall.

² Bangor, 1721, p. 277. Sometimes her handmaid Anhun is coupled with her in its foundation. See the legend, i, p. 166. "Tirmadrin" occurs in a Glamorgan charter of 1350 (G. T. Clark, Cartæ, ii, p. 4).

The festival of Mael and Sulien, which occurs in the majority of the Welsh Calendars from the fifteenth century, is on May 13. To them are dedicated conjointly the churches of Corwen, in Merionethshire, and Cwm,³ in Flintshire. There are in the same Diocese similar double Welsh dedications at S. Asaph and Llanynys. Edward Lhuyd and Browne Willis give Corwen Church as dedicated to Sulien alone, with festival on September 1; but this is a mistake.⁴ A great fair used to be held there on May 13, O.S., and is still held on the 24th. Lhuyd mentions their Holy Well, Ffynnon Fael a Sulien, at Cwm, and adds, "Some resort hither to bathe their eyes, etc."

The name Mael is in Old Welsh Maglos, and occurs in the genitive Magli on an inscribed stone at Penmachno. It enters into the composition of a number of personal names, and is rendered in Latin Servus or Calvus, the tonsured servant.

In one Iolo MSS. document,⁵ Mael, the son of Cunedda Wledig, from whom Dinmael, in Denbighshire, is supposed to take its name, is entered as a Welsh Saint.

S. MAELGWN, Monk

ACCORDING to the interesting appendix to Buchedd Ciric in Llanstephan MSS. 34 and 104, Maelgwn the Monk was an uncle to the Welsh S. Curig. He had his cell at Llangurig, in Montgomeryshire;

¹ Peniarth MSS. 16, 45, 182; Hafod MS. 16; Cardiff MS. 25, pp. 26, 114; Myv. Arch., pp. 423, 428-9.

² Pp. 103, 112, 134.

³ Browne Willis gives the dedication of Cwm Church to "S. Valacinian," i.e. Mael a Sulien (Bangor, p. 358; Paroch. Angl., p. 219).

⁴ The fifteenth century bard Guto'r Glyn couples them in an eulogy to Sir Benet, Parson of Corwen (e.g., in Additional MS. 14,971, fo. 268) :—

Traws wyd tros aelwyd tir Svlien/a Mael Milwr eglwys Gorwen.

So also in a parish list of 1590-1 (Dr. J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 913).

⁵ P. 122. There is a certain saint invoked as Maile in the Stowe Missal (Canon Warren, Liturgy of the Celtic Church, p. 240).

and the appendix records a grant of lands by Maelgwn Gwynedd to "Maelgwn the Monk and to Ciric, free from rent or gwestva to King or Bishop for ever." The circumstances under which the grant was made have been told under S. CURIG.¹ Another grant to him was by "Mael, Duke of Melienydd." There is a farm in Llangurig called Malgwyn.

Maelgwn Gwynedd was at one time a disciple of—we may infer—S. Illtyd. Gildas says to Maelgwn in his Increpatio,² "Warnings are certainly not wanting to thee, since thou hast had as instructor the refined teacher of almost the whole of Britain." The great teacher meant is generally believed to have been Illtyd.

S. MAELOG or MEILIG, Abbot, Confessor

MAELOG was one of the sons of Caw,³ and is identical with Meilig, who is also given as a son of his. The various lists of his children printed in the Iolo MSS. do not include Meilig, but Maelog is continually entered. However, among his children mentioned in the tale of Culhwch and Olwen occurs Meilig, but not Maelog. The two names are absolutely the same, the slight difference lying with the choice of diminutive suffix, ig or og, which have been affixed to the name Mael, resulting in vowel-infection in the case of Meilig. In the Life of Gildas, by the monk of Rhuis, where the Saint is connected with Llowes, in Radnorshire, he is mentioned as Mailocus, but at Llowes itself he is called Meilig. In an Ode to King Henry VII,⁴ containing a long list of Welsh and other Saints, the poet regards the names as representing two distinct Saints; and we may add that they have distinct festival days assigned to them.

Maelog is also called Tyfaelog, with the common honorific particle ty (anciently to) prefixed to his name; but in the only entry in the Iolo MSS.,⁵ where we have Tyfaelog, he is given as son of Gildas, who was really his brother.

¹ ii, pp. 193-4. Maelgwn is in Old-Welsh Maglocunos. In Cunomaglos = Cynfael, the components are transposed.

² Gildas, ed. Prof. Hugh Williams, pp. 82-3.

³ Myv. Arch., pp. 428-9; Iolo MSS., pp. 101, 109, 117, 142. In one list, ibid., p. 137, Maelon is entered as a son of Caw, but of him nothing is known, and as the list does not contain Maelog, the name is evidently a miscopying for his. A cleric named Meilic Lector, son of Merchviu, attests two grants in the Book of Llan Dâv, pp. 161-2.

⁴ Iolo MSS., p. 314.

⁵ P. 137.

In the Life of Gildas, already referred to, we are told that Maelog "had been consecrated by his father to sacred literature, and had been well trained therein. He came, after abandoning his father, and renouncing his paternal patrimony, to Lyuhes, in the district of Elmail. He there built a monastery, in which, after serving God earnestly with hymns and prayers, fastings and vigils, he rested in peace, distinguished for his virtues and miracles."¹

This account leaves much to be desired, and misstates one point. Maelog did not renounce his paternal inheritance; he was turned out of it by the incursions of the Picts and Scots, and compelled to retreat to North Wales.

He seems to have adopted the ecclesiastical profession only as a last resort. In the Mabinogion he is introduced in the story of Culhwch and Olwen. The young Culhwch arrives at King Arthur's Court to demand of the king permission to woo and wed Olwen, a damsel so fair and good that wherever she stepped four white trefoils sprang up in her steps. The request having been granted, Culhwch claimed the assistance on his quest of Arthur's knights present, and among those mentioned is "Meilic, son of Caw."² But no prospect was open to Maelog in any other direction except that of Religion, and he became an ecclesiastic, under S. Cadoc at Lllancarfan;³ but he left it and joined himself to S. Cybi, and is numbered among those who were with him in Cornwall, and who had to leave Cornwall with him, after the failure of the insurrection which had as its object the placing of Cybi on the throne, in the room, probably, of Constantine.⁴

Along with Cybi, Maelog went to the Isle of Aran; and here he got across with a particularly cantankerous Irish priest named Fintan. "It happened that on a certain day, one of the disciples of S. Cybi, named Maelog, went to the door of Crubthir (= Presbyter) Fintan to dig the ground. And Crubthir Fintan, being angry, came to forbid him, and said: 'Do not dig the ground at the door of my residence.' Then S. Cybi and Fintan went together to the abbot of the Isle of Aran, who was called Enda, and he made peace between them."⁵

A fresh occasion of trouble arose, and finally Cybi left Aran and Ireland, and migrated to Wales, where Maelgwn Gwynedd gave him lands in Anglesey, and there Maelog founded the Church of Llanfaelog.

Then he went to Llowes, in Elfael, or Elwel, in Radnorshire, near

¹ Gildas, Vita 1^{ma}, ed. H. Williams, p. 326.

² Mabinogion, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 107.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 117.

⁴ Cambro-British Saints, p. 183. Maelog is mentioned in a short poem as one of the dozen "seamen" who formed S. Cybi's teulu, or "family."

⁵ Ibid., p. 184; ii, pp. 205-6.

the Wye ;¹ possibly it was one of the grants made to the family of Caw by Arthur as blood-fine for the slaying of Huail.

Tradition points to Llowes Common as the site of Maelog's monastery, and traces of ancient buildings are still to be distinguished there, though of what period is undetermined.

In the churchyard is S. Maelog's Cross, a rude block of limestone like an early menhir, still regarded with some reverence, and supposed to have been brought from the site of his monastery, at a point still called Croes Feilig. It is described in the Archæologia Cambrensis ;² it much resembles in its ornamentation one found in Durham Cathedral. It is very unlike those found in Wales. On the side facing east is a cross of very irregular geometrical pattern, consisting of semi-lunar compartments, lozenges, and triangles. Almost every lozenge and triangle differs in size and shape from its corresponding one ; and they are simply arranged with the idea of getting in so many of each, to make out the pattern, without any attempt at true symmetrical order. The semi-lunar compartments are cut into the depth of two inches, a greater depth than the rest of the pattern.

Probably when the book of Gildas—his Increpation of the kings of Wales and Cornwall—arrived in Britain, the princes made it impossible for the sons and grandsons of Caw to remain in their territories. Indeed, it would have been a miracle of forbearance in them to tolerate their presence.

On this account, probably, Maelog departed from Powys, and we hear of him in Ireland as Moeloc Brit, or the Briton. He would seem to have taken refuge among the Deisi of Munster, and to have founded Kilmallock on the Sow that flows into the Slaney.

He seems to have been confused with another Moeloc or Malach Brit, who was a contemporary of S. Patrick, unless the legend in the Tripartite Life be a late invention to explain the poverty of the foundation. "Then Ailill, son of Cathbadh, son of Lugaidh, met S. Patrick ; his wife came to tell S. Patrick that her son had been devoured by pigs ; and Ailill said, I will believe if you resuscitate my son for me. Patrick . . . directed a céle dé of his people, Malach the Briton, to bring him to life. I will not tempt the Lord, saith Malach. Unfaith had seized him. Said Patrick : Sad is that, O Malach ! Thy cloister will be the house of one man." The scholiast adds, "His cloister is in the north-eastern angle of the southern Deisi. Its name is Kill Malaich. Five cows can hardly be fed there for ever." Then the text continues, "Patrick then ordered bishops Ibar and Ailbe to bring the boy to life. . . and the boy was restored."¹

¹ In the Book of Llan Dâw, on p. 255, the church is called "Lann Meilig ha Lygness," i.e., the Church of Meilig and Llywes. On p. 149 the Church of Llywes only.

² Arch. Camb., 1873, pp. 321-6.

Moeloc or Malach is not mentioned anywhere else in the Life of S. Patrick, and the story is inserted solely to explain the poverty of the foundation of Kilmalloch.

There may, however, well have been others of the same name in Ireland, founders of other churches with the same or similar names.

The poverty of Kilmalloch can be easily accounted for without a miracle, as the founder was not a native, but a Briton, and he remained there for only a while. We are informed that he departed and died in Letha,² i.e., Llydaw, Armorica. Now it is significant that near the monastery of S. Gildas at Locminé is Ploumelec, the plou or plebs of Maelog; and he had his locus penitentiae at Locmelec in Lanvaudan, near the Blavet, and the settlement of his nephew Cenydd at Languidec.

Le Mené, not knowing anything of S. Maelog, supposed that these places derived their names from Mellitus, first Bishop of London (d. 624),³ as if he had any connexion whatever with Broweroc, or indeed with Brittany.

The fifteenth century Welsh poet, Lewis Glyn Cothi, who calls him Maelog, Meilig, and Tyfaelog, alludes to him in one of his poems:—

Duw yno a wnaeth dynion
Val y gwnaeth Veilig a Non.⁴

In one of the "Sayings of the Wise" triplets is recorded a "saying" of Maelwg the Knight,⁵ by whom is probably meant Maelog:—

Hast thou heard the saying of Maelwg,
The knight of far-extending sight?
"The good will not make friends with the wicked."
(Nid ymgar y da â'r drwg.)

The churches dedicated to him in Wales are all in the South, with the exception of Llanfaelog, in Anglesey. Within this parish is Llyn Maelog, and near it a Ffynnon Faelog, a spring of very pure water formerly resorted to for the cure of rheumatism. Llowes, in Radnorshire, has been already mentioned. At Llandrindod, in the same county, were dug up, at the beginning of last century, the foundations

¹ Tripartite Life, ed. Stokes, pp. 198-9.

² Félire of Oengus, ed. Stokes, p. lxxv. But he calls him Mo-chelloc; and the scholiast, at a loss to explain Letha, makes it "the name of a great forest in the Desies of Munster."

³ Paroisses de Vannes, ii, p. 178. The name occurs frequently in Brittany—S. Meluc at S. Maur, No-melec at Surzur, Coet-melec at Plœrdut, Lan-vellec, a parish in Côtes-du-Nord, etc.

⁴ His Poetical Works, Oxford, 1837, p. 108; cf. pp. 340, 343. He connects him with Elfael as Tyfaelog.

⁵ Iolo MSS., p. 258.

and walls of an ancient chapel, Llanfaelog or Capel Maelog, in the middle of a field.¹ In the same county, at Llanbister, is a Gordd Faelog. To him are also dedicated Llandyfaelog Fach and Llandyfaelog Tre'r Graig, in Breconshire, and Llandyfaelog, in Carmarthenshire. Edward Lhuyd says that the Gwyl Mabsant, or Patronal Festival, of Llyswen, on the Wye, in Breconshire, was held on November 13. The church is situated between Llowes and the two Llandyfaelogs, and is regarded as dedication-less. Meilig's Festival at Llowes we know was on November 14,² and it is highly probable that Llyswen Church was also dedicated to him under one or other of his three names, probably Meilig or Tyfaelog.

It would appear that Llanarth Church, Cardiganshire, was originally dedicated to him, for in a document of the year 1592 in Harleian MS. 6,998, reference is made to "offerings in the name of devoc'on . . . for Meilicke sake in Llannarth"³ (Church). It is now dedicated to S. David. Gwynfardd Brycheiniog (early thirteenth century), in his Canu y Dewi, names it among the Dewi churches; and a great fair, called Ffair Ddewi, was held here on March 1 (O.S), and is still held on the 12th. Browne Willis⁴ and Meyrick,⁵ however, ascribe it to a "S. Vylltyg," with Festival on November 12; and the church is said to stand on a mound called Rhiw Bylltig. The nearest approach to the name that we can think of is S. Mallteg (November 1); but it is very probable that it is only a blunder for Meilig.

In Glamorganshire the parish church of the modern parish (1863) of Pontlottyn is dedicated to S. Tyfaelog; and there is a Gellifaelog in the parish of Dowlais.

Maelog's festival day is variously given. In the Calendar in John Edwards of Chirkland's Grammar, 1481, the Demetian Calendar, and by Browne Willis⁶ (in Anglesey), it is December 31. Nicolas Owen, however, in his History of Anglesey,⁷ gives January 30, and Angharad Llwyd, in her History,⁸ June 30, as the festival at Llanfaelog. His festival, under the name Meilig, is November 12 in the Demetian Calendar, and that in the Prymer of 1546 (printed Meilir), but the 14th in the Calendars in the Iolo MSS. and the Prymers of 1618 and 1633. The latter was his day at Llowes, as already mentioned.

¹ Williams, Radnorshire, ed. 1905, p. 138, where it is called Llanfaelon, but on p. 304 Llanfaelog. The "Lanvayloir" or "Landemaylon" of the Taxatio of 1291 also points to Maelon.

² Browne Willis, Paroch. Anglic., 1733, p. 184

³ Owen, Catalogue of MSS. relating to Wales in Brit. Mus., 1903, p. 504.

⁴ Paroch. Anglic., p. 194.

⁵ 1808, pp. 44, 46, 233.

⁶ Bangor, 1721, p. 279.

⁷ 1775, p. 56.

⁸ 1833, p. 248.

There was a Mailoc, bishop of Bretoña, in Galicia, in Spain, whose signature occurs among those present at the Second Council of Braga, in 572.¹

S. MAELRYS, Confessor

MAELRYS was son of Gwyddno ab Emyr Llydaw,² and a cousin of SS. Cadfan, Padarn, Tydecho, and of Henwyn, or Hywyn, of Aberdaron. He came to Wales during the great Breton immigration, due to some intestinal feud, and became a "Saint" in Bardsey, opposite to which on the mainland is Llanfaelrys (subject to Aberdaron), the only church there is dedicated to him. His Holy Well, Ffynnon Faelrys, is some distance from the church.

His festival day is not entered in any of the Welsh Calendars, but Browne Willis³ gives it as January 1.

On the confines of Llanfaelrys and Rhiw parishes are two meini hirion, or mere-stones, called Lladron Maelrys, Maelrys' Thieves. One is still standing; the other lies on the ground. The tradition is that two rascals broke into Llanfaelrys Church and stole all the money that they could find, and whilst they were at this spot crossing the parish boundary, "the judgment of God fell upon them, and turned them into two granite columns for their sacrilege." Exactly the same story is told of the Anglesey Lleidr Tyfrydog.

S. MAETHLU, Confessor

MAETHLU was the son of Caradog Freichfras ab Llyr Merini, by Tegau Eurfron, daughter of Nudd Hael.⁴ He was brother to SS.

¹ Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, etc., ii, p. 98.

² Peniarth MSS. 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16; Cambro-British Saints, p. 267; Myv. Arch., p. 428. The Iolo MSS. give him as Maelryd (p. 112), Maeleric (p. 104), and Meilir (p. 133). Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 222, adds another corrupt form, Maelerw. The name may be a compound of Mael and Rhys. The folk-etymologist offers at least two explanations of the church-name. (1) "The Church of the bald or tonsured (moel) Rhys." (2) A certain man named Rhys, from South Wales, during a famine, landed a cargo of flour near Aberdaron, which he sold to the natives at a place still called Blawtty (Meal, or Flour, House). Rhys made a good sum out of his flour, and, seeing there an extensive district without a place of worship at all, "he voluntarily devoted the proceeds (mael) to erect a small church there!" (Myrddin Fardd, Llên Gwerin Sir Gaernarfon, 1909, pp. 205-6).

³ Bangor, 1721, p. 274. So Cambrian Register, iii (1818), p. 224.

⁴ Peniarth MSS. 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16 (these give him as in Carnedawr); Peniarth MS. 12 (Kaerdegawc); Cardiff MS. 25, pp. 33, 116 (Carnedawg); Myv. Arch., p. 428 (Caerneddock); Cardiff MS. 5; Iolo MSS. pp. 104, 123. Leland, Collect., 1774, iv, p. 87, renders his name as "Magna turba militum"!

Cadfarch, Cawrdaf, and Tangwn. His name is often met with in late MSS. as Amaethlu; but the initial letter is simply the Welsh conjunction. He is said to have been a Saint "in Carneddor, in Anglesey," where he is supposed to be buried.

He is the patron of Llanfaethlu, in Anglesey, in which parish, near Plâs Ucha, was formerly a chapel also dedicated to him.¹ There is in the parish a farm called Bryn Maethlu.

His festival does not occur in any of the calendars, but Browne Willis² gives it as December 26. Rees³ and others suggest that Llandevalley, in Breconshire, is dedicated to him; but this is impossible.⁴

S. MAGLORIUS, Bishop, Confessor

THE authorities for the Life of Maglorius are: (1) a Vita attributed to Balderic of Angers, Archbishop of Dol from 1107 to 1130, in Mabillon, Acta SS. o.s. B., sæc. i (ed. 1733), pp. 209-17; (ed. 1668), pp. 223-31; (2) reprinted in the Acta SS. Boll. Oct. x, pp. 782-91, collated with another text; (3) a condensation by John of Tynemouth, in Capgrave. Although attributed to Balderic it is probably earlier, but not earlier than the ninth century. It contains no account of the theft of the body by the monks of Léhon in the ninth century, nor of the later translation to Paris, 920-945. But it accepts the preposterous fable of the creation of Dol as archiepiscopal see of Brittany by Childebert. It is interesting as giving the pre-Norman names of the Channel Islands, Sargia, and Bissargia. In addition, see Les Miracles de S. Magloire, by A. de la Borderie, in Mém. de la Soc. Arch. des Côtes du Nord, 2nd ser., iv, pp. 224 et seq. For Bibliography of works on S. Magloire see the Abbé Duine, L'Hermine, T. xxvi, pp. 135-9, Rennes, 1902. The Welsh name that has been Latinized as Maglorius is Meilyr, or Meilir.

He was a native of Britain, son of Umbrafel and Afrella. His mother was sister of Anna, the wife of Amwn Ddu, so that he was first cousin to S. Samson. He became a disciple, like Samson, of S. Illtyd. He was ordained deacon by S. Samson, and we may presume that he was some years his junior.

When Samson crossed into Armorica, Maglorius accompanied

¹ Angharad Llwyd, Hist. of Anglesey, 1733, p. 249.

² Bangor, 1721, p. 280.

³ Welsh Saints, p. 270.

⁴ Cf. the Lann Tipallai of the Book of Llan Dâv, p. 409 (index).

him. The biographer, imbued with the false notions prevalent at Dol, of which he was Archbishop, pretends that Samson was instituted Metropolitan of all Brittany by Childebert; whereas Dol was not elevated to be an Archbishopric till 848.¹

When Samson was dying, he nominated Maglorius to be his successor. But he soon wearied of the office, and, pretending that he acted on the recommendation of an angel, he resigned his staff into the hands of Budoc, and retired to a lonely spot that had been given to the see or abbey by Judual,² whom Samson had restored to the throne of Domnonia. But crowds came to him with their ailments and sought to be healed, and Maglorius meditated flight. Budoc, his successor in the see, strongly urged him to remain.³ This, however, he would not do.

A certain Loescon, a British settler, occupied Sark, and invited Maglorius to establish himself there, and gave up to him half the island. However, trouble soon arose between Loescon and Maglorius and his monks. He complained that they took more than their share of the fishing and birds and their eggs. After vain attempts to come to a settlement, Loescon, in spite of the angry protests of his wife, gave up the entire islet to Maglorius, who immediately established thereon an important monastery.

From Sark, Maglorius visited Jersey,⁴ where he destroyed a dragon, and was rewarded with a grant of land in that island. But he was not to remain peacefully on the rock of Sark; a fleet of Saxons came there and attempted to land and plunder the monastery. Maglorius encouraged the natives and his monks to resist, and they drove off the pirates, who lost many lives in the attempt.⁵

In the year 585 there was famine, and the monks on Sark had exhausted their store of grain, and were in some trouble what to do for bread. Eggs they had and fish, but needed the staff of life. One day some little boys in the monastery asked Maglorius to allow them to go down to the beach and play there, where their noise might not disturb the monks. Maglorius consented, and the children went to the port called le Creux. There they found an old boat, got into it, cast it loose, and thought to row about till tired and then return.

¹ "A strenuissimo rege Francorum Childeberto accepto Archipræsulatus regimine non solum inibi, verum etiam in omnem Britannorum regionem seu in circuitu ejus longe lateque nomen ejus enituit."

² Mabillon incorrectly prints Raduallus. Most MSS. have Juduallus.

³ "Melius est oves Domini colligere quam dispergere; melius est contritos corde sanare, quam infirmos relinquere."

⁴ Sargiam. Jersey took its present name after the occupation by the Normans.

⁵ Miracula S^{ci}. Maglorii in Mém. de la Soc. Arch. des Côtes du Nord, 2 ser., IV.,

for Aldroen. ubi Glandoren in Morbihan
Aldroen Vannic, Jusselien, Jusselien 21867
Bretagne 5378

S. Maglorius 409

But the current was too strong for them, and they were carried out to sea. The boys were in a dire fright. Happily the tide was running inland and they were carried to the coast of the mainland, where they told their story, and also mentioned the dearth of corn in the island. When the King of Domnonia heard of this, he sent for them, and was amused at hearing their adventure. He at once ordered a ship to be laden with corn and sent to Sark to relieve the necessities of the monks.

Maglorius, in a rash moment, had made a vow to drink neither wine nor ale, and to fast from all food twice in the week, and to eat fish only on festivals. But he soon tired of this regimen; and the convenient angel again appeared to him and dispensed him from observance of his vow. This he explained to his monks, and they received the information with due decorum.

The date of the death of Maglorius is not given, but it must have taken place about 586.

His body was afterwards stolen by some monks of Léhon, near Dinan, and conveyed there. Later, owing to the incursions of the Northmen, it was transported to Paris.

In Jersey his name is corrupted to S. Mannelier.

In Brittany, he is patron of Léhon, Châtelaudren, Mahalon, Plo-modiern, Telgruc and Trélivet.

He is represented at Châtelaudren by a statue attributed to the sculptor Corlay, as an archbishop in rochet, cope and mitre.

His day is October 24, in the Modern Roman Martyrology, in a Martyrology written between 1220 and 1224 that belonged to Canterbury; in Brit. Mus. MS. Reg. 2, A. xiii; in a Norwich Martyrology of the fifteenth century, Cotton MS. Julius, B. vii; in an English Martyrology of the sixteenth century, Lansdowne MS. 366, etc. Capgrave, on the same day. In Brittany, MS. Kal. S. Méen, fifteenth century, the Breviary of Dol, 1519, the MS. Brev. S. Melanias, Rennes, fifteenth century, MS. Missal of Tréguier, same period, MS. Missal of S. Malo, also fifteenth century, the S. Malo Missal of 1609, the Breviary of Quimper, 1835. But the Breviary of S. Briec, 1783, on July 24; and the Breviary of Léon, 1516, on October 22.

Among more modern English Martyrologies, Whytford, and Wilson in both editions, 1608 and 1640, and Challoner, who is no authority at all.

It is possible that S. Melor in Cornwall may actually be dedicated to Maglorius, though usually accounted to have S. Melor, the Boy martyr, as patron.

Of S. Maglorius the Abbé Duine says: " Son culte n'a nullement

Also St. Aldroen...
Olivier...
Jusselien...
Bretagne...

un caractère populaire dans les rares églises bretonnes qui lui sont consacrées. Allez à Châtaudren, par exemple. Le clergé y célèbre sa fête. Mais c'est un patron que les paysans n'invoquent pas. Il n'a qu'un sanctuaire ravissant : celui de Léhon, caché dans la verdure des rives de la Rance. A Dol même, aucun rite traditionnel ne manifeste sa vie dans la mémoire du peuple." ¹

The hymn sung on All Saints' Day, "Coelo quos eadem gloria consecrat," has been attributed to him.

S. MAGNUS, Confessor

RHYGYFARCH, in his Life of S. David,² says that when that Saint and his companions were on their way from S. David's to the synod at Llanddewi Brefi, and had come near that place, they heard on the banks of the Teify the funeral wail or keen raised by a mother over the corpse of her son, a boy named Magnus. S. David had compassion on the woman, and raised the boy to life again, who afterwards led a religious life for the rest of his days, and was with S. David for many years. The boy's name is not given either in Giraldus's or in the Welsh Life of the Saint. In Gwynfardd's poem, Canu y Dewi,³ he is called "Magna uab," Magna the boy, and in the later poem, of the fifteenth century, printed in the Iolo MSS.,⁴ he is also called "Magna." Magnus may be an intended translation of a Welsh name, such as Mawr, Mar, or Mor. That there was a S. Mor is certain, though not the son of Ceneu ab Coel or of Pasgen ab Urien.⁵

S. MAITIUN, or MAITRUN, Confessor

IN the Life of S. David, as written by Rhygyfarch, we read, "Boducat and Maitiun (or Maitrun), two Saints in the province of Cetgueli (Kidwelly) gave him (S. David) their hands,"⁶ and became his disciples. The reading of the name is uncertain. In the Welsh Life it is Na'itrun.⁷ Nothing further seems to be known of these two Saints. Among "the men who went to Gododin, with laughter and sprightliness," was "the son of Botgat, who, by the energy of his hand, caused

¹ L'Hermine, T. xxvi (1902), pp. 261-2.

² Cambro-British Saints, p. 138.

³ Myv. Arch., p. 195.

⁴ P. 299.

⁵ Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, p. 470.

⁶ Cambro-British Saints, p. 123.

⁷ Llyuyr Agkyr, p. 108.

a throbbing." ¹ This Bodgad, assuming we may equate the two names, may be a different person, though of much the same period. Skene, however, regards it as a place-name, the same as Badcat, Bathcat, or Bathgate, a parish of Linlithgowshire. ²

S. MALLTEG

OF this Saint we know nothing, but he is assumed to be the patron of the Pembroke-Carmarthen parish of Llanfallteg. Browne Willis ³ gives the festival there as November 1. See what has been said under S. MAELOG of Llanarth Church.

S. MALO, Bishop, Confessor

BEFORE dealing with the Life of this Saint, it is necessary to say something about our principal sources of information.

The original Life of S. Malo, to which later biographers refer as their authority, and on which they base their story, has disappeared, and all that we possess are the several re-compositions, re-touchings, re-groupings of incidents, and amplifications, by different hands, at different dates, and of different values.

1. The most trustworthy of the Lives that we possess is one published by John a Bosco in his Floriacensis vetus Bibliotheca, 1605, pp. 485-515, by an anonymous author, and republished in a more correct form from the original MS. by M. F. Lot in his Mélanges d'Hist. bret., 1907. This we will designate by the letter F. From this Life Vincent of Beauvais drew those extracts which he used in his Speculum historiale in the thirteenth century.

2. Closely allied to this, indeed a condensation from it, is that which we possess in MS. Lat. 12404 in the Bibl. Nat. at Paris, and this has been published by De la Borderie in the Bulletin de la Société archéologique d'Ille et Vilaine, 1884, pp. 265-312. But another copy with different readings exists in MS. 3213 of the Bibl. royale de Belgique; on which see Van den Gheyn, Catalogue des MSS. de la Bibl. roy. de Belgique, v (1905). De la Borderie wrongly supposed that this was an earlier form of A, and that F was an amplification of A. M. F. Lot has dispelled this error.

¹ Book of Aneirin, ed. Dr. J. G. Evans, 1908, p. 2.

² Four Ancient Books, i, p. 92; ii, pp. 372-3.

³ Parochiale Anglic., 1733, p. 188.

This Vita we will designate by the letter A. It has been supposed to have been composed at Saintes, as it is very precise as to the indication of localities in the Saintonge, but is vague with regard to localities in Brittany. Up to chapter vi inclusive the Saint is called Machutes, but after that, sometimes Machlovus and only occasionally Machutes; and this seems to imply that the compiler had recourse to two authorities, one of whom employed one name and the second the other.

3. Mabillon in Acta SS. o.s. B., sæc. i, 1668, pp. 217-21, published another Life from an anonymous MS. now in the Bibl. Nat. at Paris, MS. Lat. 11759, of which there is another copy in the Royal Library at Brussels. This we will indicate by the letter M.

4. Sigebert of Gembloux, in the eleventh century, wrote another Life of S. Malo, at the request of his abbot Thietmar. This has been published in the Vite Sanctorum of Surius; also by Migne, Patrol. Lat., clx, colls. 729-46.

These four form a group to themselves, relating the same incidents, mainly in the same order.

5. Apart from these is the Life by Bili, deacon of the Church of Aleth, and dedicated to Bishop Ratuil, who occupied the see from 866 to about 890. Bili had been already entrusted with an important mission by Rethwalart, the predecessor of Ratuil (848-66), to the Bishop of Léon. As Bili makes no allusion to the destruction of Aleth by the Northmen in 876 or 878, his work must have been written prior to that event. Of this Life by Bili, two MSS. exist, one of the tenth century,† in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, and one, not later than the eleventh century, in the British Museum (Royal MS. 13 A. x). It was published by Dom Plaine in Bulletin de la Soc. Archéol. d'Ille et Vilaine, t. xvi (1884), pp. 167-256. A critical review of A and that by Bili, which we will indicate by the letter B, by the Abbé Duchesne, appeared in the Revue Celtique, t. xi (1890), pp. 1-22. More recently, and with still greater severity, has the Life by Bili been dealt with by M. F. Lot in Mélanges d'Histoire bretonne, 1907.

In his prologue, Bili says that another sage (alius sapiens) had written, "the virtue, the origin, the pergrination, and the sojourn in divers places of the holy bishop," but that several having attempted to rewrite it, the Life had been vitiated in the process. But Bili did not depend only on this ancient Life, for he speaks as well as deriving information from the "relation and narration of faithful men." The main Vita on which he based his biography was anonymous, "Nomen ejus in fronte tituli non invenimus," but the author had written it long before Bili was born, "longo tempore antequam nos orti fuissimus." Bili was born about 840; he was deacon in 870. The original biographer cannot have lived later than 800. Bili had also recourse to a panegyric that was wont to be preached in the Cathedral Church of Aleth on the Festival of S. Malo. From this he copied a passage twice over in chapters xlii and lxxvii; and in chapter lxxxv he gives pretty clear token that he is transcribing from a panegyric read in public.

^{MS.}
Bodley 525 i. incant.

Mgr. Duchesne points out reasons why it is not possible to suppose that the primitive biographer can have written earlier than 800. The liturgical details given in the description of the Mass celebrated on the back of the whale, show the employment of the Roman Missal and not the Gallican, on which the Celtic was based. The Agnus Dei following the Pater Noster is a characteristic feature. We know when this was introduced into the Roman Mass, it was when Sergius was Pope (687-701). But this is no evidence of the late date of the "Sage" biographer, for the story of the marvellous voyage in which this incident occurs is an interpolation; and there is no reason whatever for supposing that it existed in the primitive biography of the Saint, but only in the interpolated editions of Bili and of the anonymous writers of F and A. Bili was, however, an unscrupulous writer. This is shown by the way in which he has taken slices out of the Life of S. Paternus of Avranches by Venantius Fortunatus, and has adapted them to his hero. His prologue is, to a large extent, borrowed without acknowledgment, and chapters xlii, xliii, and xlvi, on the austerities of the Saint, on his giving bread to the hungry, and on his healing a mute, are all taken from the work of Venantius, with the simple alteration of the names of persons and places. Duchesne says: "Fraud, for that is what it is, must be laid to the charge of Bili. Not only has he drawn from another man's work the studied phrases that adorned his prologue, but he has not scrupled to transport to S. Malo the record made by Fortunatus of the austerities of S. Paternus and of the miracles that Avranches tradition attributed to him. Here we have a fact at the outset little calculated to inspire respect for the work, or for the hagiographer."

Both the anonymous Saintes biography and that by Bili contain a narrative of the voyage of Malo with S. Brendan in quest of the Isle of the Blessed. This is merely a version of the popular Navigatio Brendani. And in order to justify the sending of Malo on this quest with Brendan, the name of the abbot of Llancarfan, under whom Malo studied, was altered from probably Cadoc to Brendan.

When this interpolation took place is uncertain; whether it had already been made in the narrative of the "quidam sapiens" on whose work both biographers grounded their Lives, or whether the interpolation took place in both later, is not certain.

Both A and B follow the original text up to chapter v of A, and xi of B. But after that comes divergence.

Bili is most full on the history of the Saint's life whilst he was at Aleth. In A and F there is vagueness relative to the life in Brittany, but when the authors come to the exile of Malo in the Saintonge, then, at once, we have details such as lack for this part of the story in the biography of Bili.

"In Bili," says De la Borderie, "the proper names of men and places (in Brittany), particulars of customs, precise details, both topical and topographical, abound. In A (and F) most of these features and the proper names disappear, and what may be termed local colour is entirely absent. What of this exists, is to be found only in the episodes relative to the sojourn of S. Malo in Saintonge. Thus in Life A (and F) one learns that the young daughter healed by Malo from a serpent bite was the child of the Count of Saintes; that the village of Brea contained two churches, one of which Leontius, Bishop of Saintes, reserved to himself, but surrendered the other to S. Malo; that the child who fell into a well and was recovered by S. Malo, had been sent by the Bishop of Saintes at day-break to fetch water for him as he wanted to wash himself. There are none of these details in Bili."

Based on Bili's Life is the Legend of S. Malo in the Marmoutier Legendarium, published by Dom Morice in Preuves de l'histoire de Bretagne, i, pp. 191-3; also a Life by John of Tynemouth in Capgrave's Nova Legenda. A copy which Leland saw, and from which he made extracts, and which is now lost, contained details now not found in Bili's work (Collect., i, p. 432). The Life in Capgrave contains an account of a journey to Rome not found in the original work of Bili. This was a late interpolation made at a time when the Breton monks desired to show that their saintly founders had been in close connexion with the Apostolic See.

Bili relates the ordination of Malo to the priesthood; in place of this the other biographer gives us the hackneyed story of carrying live coals in his mantle. Both redactions draw together to describe the knowledge and piety of the Saint, and the anonymous biographer says that S. Brendan committed to him the office of preacher, which implies his previous ordination, that this writer has failed to mention.

Next, in both biographies we have the story of the fabulous journey in quest of the Isle of Yma. This is an importation into both works of the Adventures of that Celtic Sinbad, S. Brendan the Voyager.

The Saintes biographer cuts the account short; he says that the party which consisted of ninety-five in one boat, "hac illacque vagantes," failed to reach the island of which they were in quest, but did reach the Orcades and other islands in the North. This is taken from the First Voyage of Brendan.

Then, according to the Saintes Biographer, the party returned, and Malo was ordained bishop at Llancarfan. Next follows the account of the Second Voyage in quest of the Isle of the Blessed, also taken from the Legend of S. Brendan. Bili, on the other hand, does not make Malo return to Wales, but runs on with the story of the marvellous voyage. This looks much as if the interpolation took place not in the original Life, but in those of Bili and the Saintes biographer. In that of Bili it was put in in a lump, in that of the other it was cut up. The anonymous biographer is more prolix than Bili, but both interpolations were clearly derived from the same narrative of Brendan's Voyages.

On his return from the Voyage, Malo resolves on quitting Wales for Armorica, and the circumstances of the departure are related by both biographers in much the same manner. But on the arrival of Malo at Aleth, they differ. Bili makes him disembark on the isle of Césambre, where he spends three months with the monk Festivus. Then he comes to Aleth. The anonymous biographer, on the other hand, makes him disembark on the isle of Aaron, where he remains with that solitary till the bishopric of Aleth is confided to him. The two accounts do not necessarily conflict. But what is a serious divergency now occurs. In the Life by Bili, as we have it, ensues his consecration as bishop at Tours by the Metropolitan, and this is given with considerable detail, but the name of the Archbishop of Tours is not given. Moreover, hitherto Bili has invariably called his Saint Machu, but here the name comes in as Maclovius. Now, this entire passage relative to the consecration at Tours is almost certainly an interpolation into Bili's narrative. Bili wrote at the very time when Nominoe was emancipating the Breton Church from the jurisdiction of Tours (848). Nominoe had placed the See of Aleth under the Metropolitan throne of Dol. In 866 Pope Nicolas I wrote a violent letter to the Archbishop of Dol, declaring that he ignored the new arrangement, and that he considered Dol and the other Breton sees as subject to Tours. In the same year a council at Soissons denounced the audacity of the Bretons in detaching their church from its allegiance to Tours.

What Bili wrote probably was—First, the ordination of Malo as priest at Llancarfan. This has dropped out of the Saintes Life, but is implied. Then, secondly, that Malo was consecrated bishop in South Wales. This the Saintes biographer relates. Then, thirdly, that he became bishop of Aleth.

But the text of Bili was deliberately altered at a later period. We can fix the date with some precision. The bishops of Aleth, down to Daniel II, recognised Dol as their Metropolitan See, but his successor, Donoald, in 1120, deliberately turned his back on Dol, and went to Tours for consecration. Again, his successor, John of the Grate, went to Rome to be consecrated, being unwilling to acknowledge allegiance to Dol; and his successor, Albert, went for consecration to Tours, in 1163. Thus, 1120 marks the date of the desertion of the See of Aleth from allegiance to Dol,¹ and is the approximate date of the falsification of Bili's Life, so as to justify Donoald in going to Tours, by the example of the great founder of the See.

But if something has been interpolated in Bili's narrative, something also has been cut out of it. In the copy that Leland had under his eye,² it was stated that Machu went to Paris to receive confirmation of the grants made to him by Childebert the king. This was excised because distasteful to later Bretons to have it recorded that the Bishop had recognized his vassalage to the Frank Crown. Bili did not scruple to admit it from the text of the ancient "Sage," for he wrote at a time when it was well known that such had been the general practice. The excision must have taken place before the final reorganization of Brittany under Alan Barbetorte, who paid homage to the French Crown in 942; but certain copies of Bili's work had remained untampered with.

In the anonymous Life we have an account of the persecution of Malo and his monastery by a Breton duke named Haeloc. Bili calls him Rethwald, and says that he was the son of Judual, and entitles him king. Shortly after, he relates that on the death of Judual an impious man named Rethwal sought to kill all the sons of Judual except Haeloc, whom he resolved on investing with the royal power. Probably, as Duchesne points out, we have here two versions of the same fact. Bili, in his prologue, asserts that he has laid tradition under contribution,³ and here he has eked out what he found in his text with what he heard related. The solution offered by De la

¹ De Corson, Pouillé de l'Archevêché de Rennes, 1880, T. i.

² Leland, Collect., 1774, ii, pp. 430-1.

³ "Itaque, sicut relatione et narratione fidelium virorum . . . didicimus, has paucas de plurimis narrationes paginis inserere procuravimus." Vita B., ed. Plaine, p. 171.

see 431
wh

* Malo = Judual

Borderie is that Rethwal was the foster-father of Haeloc, and that on the death of Judual he murdered several of the sons of Judual, so as to exalt Haeloc to the throne; and that Malo suffered annoyance from both Rethwal and Haeloc. In Bili follows a series of chapters (lxi-xci) on the miracles and virtues of the Saint, mere commonplace of no value. There is, however, one exception, a triple miracle wrought at Corseul, that is also related by the Saintes biographer.

With the rest of the Life of S. Malo we will deal in the sequel; so far we have sought only to point out the agreements and differences in the two Lives. We will now treat of the interpolation common to both, from the fabulous voyages of S. Brendan. "Fabulous voyages formed a class of Irish literature, some of which are of pre-Christian origin. Of these Imrama five remain: 1, Imram Brain Meic Febuil; 2, Imram Snedhghusa; 3, Imram curaig Mailduin; 4, Imram curaig Ua Corra; 5, Imram Brenain. The object in all these is the quest of Tir Tairngeri, or Hy Breasail, the Island of the Blessed, of Eternal Youth, or the Fortunate Isle in the far West. The Brendan voyage is a Christian version of the myth made first in Irish in the ninth century, and then rendered freely and with variations into Latin, when it spread through Europe. It formed the theme of an Anglo-Norman poem, composed in 1121, which was translated into Latin, of a Flemish prose narrative of the twelfth century, of a French poem Ymage du Monde 1245, and of an Anglo-Norman prose account in the thirteenth century which is lost, but on which were based a Middle German poem of the same period, and a Middle Netherland poem of the thirteenth century."¹

The incidents in the voyage of Malo are mainly three: 1. He calls to life a dead giant named Milldu, who had been buried under a huge cairn (busto). This is altered from the voyage of Brendan, who resuscitates a gigantic damsel, not a man. But the giant restored to life occurs in the Lives of S. Patrick and of S. Cadoc.² 2. He finds a wonderful spring, and also a marvellous fruit, of which he brings a graft to Llancarfan. This is borrowed from the Navigation of S. Brendan. 3. He celebrates Easter on the back of a whale. This is a transfer from the Brendan Voyage.

That chapters xv-xxviii in Bili are an insertion at a later period appears from the structure. Bili has been describing the virtues, the vigils and fastings of Machu and gives a scrap of one of his sermons. Then suddenly breaks off, "Inter hæc incidit in mente Brendani ejus magistri in navigatio exire," etc.; and when this episode of the voyage is ended, chapter xxix begins, "Sed ut ad propositum redeam."

¹ Schirmer, Zur Brendan Sage, Leipzig, 1888, pp. 17-18, 68-9.

² Tripartite Life, ed. Stokes, pp. 123, 324. Cambro-British Saints, pp. 56-7.

The introduction of this fabulous matter had a disintegrating effect on both the Lives. We shall see later on what gave rise to the insertion of this extraneous matter.

We will now take the Life as far as it can be made out, with the elimination of this added matter.

Malo, or as he is called in his earlier Lives, Machutus, Machu, or Maclovius,¹ was born in Gwent, and was the son of Derwela or Dervel, sister of Amwn Ddu. Bili does not give his father's name; he contents himself with saying that he was a noble of Gwent. From other sources we learn that his father was Caradog, also the father (not son) of Ynyr Gwent.² His mother was aged forty when he was born.³ The parents lived near Llancafán, where was the famous monastery of S. Cadoc. Malo was delivered over at an early age to the abbot to be baptized and educated. His mother visited the monastery on the vigil of Easter, although then in an interesting condition, and was taken with the pangs of labour, and brought forth the child there.⁴ On the same night as that on which Malo was born (Easter Eve), ¹ Other forms in Lives are Maclou, Machutes, Machutius, Macutus, and Magutus. It is not easy in all cases to explain the polymorphic changes of the name. The common present-day form Malo is obviously from Machlou (whence Maclovius), which would now be in Welsh Machleu (with it cf. the Machreu of the Afallenau). In the Book of Llan Dâu, p. 241, he is called Machumur, i.e., Malo the Great. (For mur see ii, p. 382, of this work.) S. Maughan's, Monmouthshire (the -n here is hypocoristic, as in Meuthin, etc.), otherwise Ecclesia S. Machuti, occurs in the Book of Llan Dâu as Lann Mocha (and Bocha). The nearest parallel to it that we know of is Docguinnus (Cyngar), which is found as Dochu and Docha. Machutus is a derivative of Machu, and with it should be compared the female name Machuta, or Maches. From this is derived the Welsh form Machudd. Another Welsh form of the name is Mechyll or Mechell, where we have the well-known diminutive suffixes as in brithyll, curyll; Cadell, Rhiell, etc. In Scotland he is Mahago, as in Les-mahago = Ecclesia S. Machuti, in Lanarkshire. The Irish calendars give him as Machud.

² Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, p. 285. According to the Life of S. Tathan (Cambro-British Saints, p. 257), Caradog was king of the two Gwents, and is made to be the father of Ynyr. The Saintes Biographer calls Malo's father Gwent. "Pater ejusdem Sancti vocatus Guento fuit nobilissimus comes, conditor urbis dicte Guinnicastrum." He accordingly makes Ynyr Gwent the father, not brother, of the Saint; but with regard to the mother, he says that she was the sister of Amwn, father of S. Samson. At Godmanchester, in Huntingdonshire, it was claimed that Malo had been bishop there, and was son of a count of that place (Leland, Collect., iv, p. 14).

³ The Anonymous Biographer says that she was aged sixty-six. Bili is content with forty years of age.

⁴ "Ad quod (monasterium) mater S. Machuti nocte vigiliæ Paschæ ad vigilandum venerat: quæ ibi in nocte illa filium suum edidit." Vita B, c. 2. There were thirty-three mothers "riding" with her, all in the same interesting condition, and all delivered simultaneously. A serious distraction for the monks.

thirty-three other boys saw the light for the first time, and Caradog had them brought together, and delivered over to the abbot to be educated along with his son, and to act as his servants and attendants through life. Allowing for some exaggeration, we may admit a substratum of truth in this story. Caradog sent to the monastery a number of lads, of about his son's age, to be his foster-brothers and domestics. It was customary also, when a child was committed to an abbot, to furnish as well at least one cow.

Malo was given a waxed tablet on which the alphabet was inscribed and he thus learned the letters, and the "elements."¹

Both biographers consider it deserving of commemoration that Malo, as a boy, perspired freely.²

When he was a child he is said to have gone to sleep on the seashore, when the tide was out, and that the tide rising, he was lifted up upon a mass of seaweed on which he lay, and that this upraised mass became an island that was called, according to Bili, Rore, according to F and A, Rorea. This was none other than one of the Holmes in the Severn Sea, namely, the Steep Holme, which was known as Ronech, a name which seems to mean "the Isle of Seals." Florence of Worcester, s.a. 915, calls it Reoric.

When Malo had reached adolescence, his parents sent for him to quit the monastery and enter secular life. But Malo had resolved on embracing the ecclesiastical profession, and instead of obeying his father and mother, ran away, took refuge on an islet at some distance from the land, and absolutely refused to leave it unless he were allowed to embrace the monastic condition of life. His parents gave way, and he was ordained priest, perhaps before he had reached the canonical age; and at the moment that the bishop laid his hands upon him, a white dove was seen perched on his right shoulder. This is a hagiographical commonplace.

By this time Malo had acquired the entire Psalter by heart; and such would seem to have been one of the main requirements of the monastic schools. Up to this point the two Lives agree in almost every particular, in fact, they agree verbatim. Chapters i-xii of Bili correspond with Chapters i-v of the Saintes Life. From this point the agreement ceases where the interpolation of the fabulous voyage comes in. The author of Vita A makes Malo to be ordained bishop in Wales, whereas Bili allows, in the version that has reached us, only that he was there ordained priest.

¹ "Scripsit elementa in tabula cerea." Vita B, c. 3. Vita A, c. 1.

² "Semper videbant guttas minutissimas de fronte atque de facie ejus fluere." Vita B, c. 4; also Vita A.

The story of the Miraculous Voyage must be totally eliminated, and that done, we come to the plain facts of Malo resolving to quit Lllancarfan. When his father heard his resolve, he interposed his paternal authority, and the abbot was also most reluctant to let him go. Undeterred by opposition, Malo, who was headstrong, went to the coast and embarked, and his father and mother, standing on a hill-top, waved to him a reluctant farewell.

There was much to induce Malo to leave. The Yellow Plague had broken out and was devastating the land, sweeping away whole populations. Teilo, at Llandaff, had been collecting all the bishops and clerics of the neighbourhood for flight. His cousin, Samson, was already in Armorica. If our calculation be right, Malo quitted Lllancarfan in 547.

The two biographers disagree as to where Malo landed at first. The Saintes writer says that he left his ship at the Isle of Aaron and that he remained there till the city of Aleth was converted.¹ Bili, however, says that he disembarked on the island of September (Césambre), where an abbot, Festivus, had a school, and remained on it for three months, and went thence direct to Aleth, and that he was forty years old when he landed at Césambre. Not long after that he returned to Aaron.² The two accounts may be reconciled. Malo landed first at Césambre, and after a brief sojourn there, crossed to the Isle of Aaron just off the mainland, over against Aleth, and made that his headquarters for mission-work in Aleth. The Saintes biographer, not knowing the localities, confounded the islands, or perhaps thought that the brief sojourn on Césambre was not worthy of note.

Here we obtain the clue to the puzzle of the relations between Malo and Brendan. Both biographers make Brendan abbot of Lllancarfan, and the master under whom Malo was trained. No Welsh authorities allow that Brendan ever was abbot of Lllancarfan, and none of the Lives of Brendan mention his having been there, but the Life in the Cambro-British Saints, influenced by the current Lives of S. Malo, makes this latter a disciple of Brendan. But the monastery of Césambre had been founded by Brendan some quarter of a century before (see S. BRENDAN), and it was called Monasterium Brendani. Thus, the three months' stay in Césambre brought the name of Brendan into the story. The fact that Malo was at one time in the Monastery of Brendan was magnified into making him a disciple of Brendan, and as it was recorded that Malo had been trained at Llancarfan, the interpolator inserted the name of Brendan as abbot of that monastery, so as to give occasion for making Malo accompany Brendan on his voyage.

¹ Vita A, c. 15. ;

² "Ille igitur perveniens ad insulam quæ vocatur September, ubi sacerdos fidelis Deo serviens Festivus nomine, cum scola plurima habitabat." Vita B, c. 35. "Tribus mensibus cum eo fuerunt . . . et ille, ut dicitur, quando ad illam insulam devenit quadraginta annorum vitam compleverat." Ibid., c. 39-

Malo now set to work to convert probably the native population of Aleth. These were the original natives, not the British colonists, who were not numerous in that part, at the time. Aleth is where now stands S. Servan. The isle of Aaron was in Malo's time much larger than at present. It is now occupied by the city of S. Malo, but then the islets of Le Grand and Le Petit Bé formed part of it. The Saintes biographer says, "Not far from the isle Aaron was the city (Aleth). It lies on the sea-shore, having on one side the river called Rinctus (Rance) but the sea on the other. And in those parts the Britons were not altogether Christian. Then, therefore, the celebrated prelate Machlovus began to instruct the people, and lead them into the way of truth. S. Samson also, his cousin, and cousin also of Maglorius, was doing the same in his town."¹

Malo exerted himself energetically in founding monasteries, not only at Aleth, but also in other suitable places, and, in addition to these, cells for retreat in Lent.²

Malo was at Aaron or Aleth at a time when all Domnonia was in a ferment. The Saints of Domnonia, Léon and Cornubia had assembled on the summit of the Menez Bré, and had excommunicated and cursed Conmore, the regent and viceroy of Childebert, if we may trust a late authority, and the British colonists were falling away from him. Samson was bringing Judual, the legitimate prince, back from Paris to reinstate him in his father's kingdom. Conmore came to Corseul, the ancient Fanum Martis, the old capital of the Curiosoliti, and ordered Malo to celebrate before him on the following day, which was the Feast of Easter; but Malo, knowing that the regent was excommunicate, had purposely left wine and chalice behind him, and alleged this as his excuse for not complying with the command. But Conmore was imperious and insisted. Malo was overawed into submission, and by some means the requisite wine was procured, and a stone cup was employed in place of a chalice.

Such would seem to be the true version of a story told by Bili, and greatly transformed. He makes Malo accidentally meet Conmore at Corseul, on Easter Eve, and finding himself to be without wine and chalice, changed water into the fruit of the grape, and converted a stone into a chalice. Now, it is improbable that Malo should have gone to Corseul away from his monastery to celebrate the Paschal Feast, when Conmore was there, unless summoned to meet the regent. And it is also improbable that he should neglect to bring the necessary utensil and wine for the Sacrifice, except purposely. It is almost impossible to reconcile the story with the chronology of Malo's Life, unless we place this incident at the Easter of 555, probably the year in which the political revolution took place that led to the defeat and death of Conmore. The story is told out of its proper place in Bili's narrative as it has reached us dislocated by the interpolator. The other biographer also tells the story, but in a confused manner, in its proper place, however, as occurring shortly after the arrival of Malo in Brittany (c. xvi). He does not mention Conmore, but tells how Malo resuscitated a dead man, who at once shouted for drink, and when he refused water, Malo obligingly converted water into wine to gratify him.

¹ The Saintes biographer, not knowing that there were two distinct races there, makes a mistake, and calls the whole population of Aleth British.

² "Divina misericordia procurante . . . per fidelem famulum suum Machu-tem tam in ipsa civitate quam et per insulas et loca viciniora monasteria et cellulæ, ubi non modicæ monachorum congregationes Deo servire videbantur, constructa esse noscitur." Vita B, c. 40.

Conmore was defeated in three battles, and was killed on the slopes of the Monts d'Arée later on in the same year.¹ Then Judual became king over Léon and Domnonia, and richly rewarded the abbots and bishops who had worked so strenuously for him.

A disciple of Malo was named Rivan. He was one of those who had been given to him by his father, to be his servant.² Another was Domnech, who settled at a place that still bears his name, formerly Lanndomnech, but now Saint Domineuc, near Tinténiac. Bili, who has just told us that Aleth was a town "a longo jam tempore derelicta," now forgets this, and informs us that Meliau was the prince who ruled in Aleth (c. 44). Meliau, happening to pass where Domnech was, made a present to him of a couple of oxen. One day Malo found a poor wretch hiding in a ditch, and asked him what he did there. "Alas!" replied the man, "I am swine-herd to the hermit Domnech, and I have lost one of his sows. I am in fear of my life to return to the holy man, and this is the third day that I have been lurking here, in hiding from his wrath."

After a few encouraging words, Malo accompanied the pig-driver in quest of the lost sow, and happily discovered her in a brake where she had littered eight piglings. Then Malo led the man to his master and obtained from him pardon for his serf. Domnech received his abbot with prostrations, and induced him to spend a night and a day with him in his cell. Possibly this same Domnech became later Bishop of Vannes, for there was one of the name who ruled that see from 591 to 602. The anonymous biographer tells the story somewhat differently.

¹ The date of the defeat and death of Conmore is that fixed by De la Borderie. It is approximate only.

² "Servus ejus Rivan." Vita B, c. 43.

After the fall of Conmore and the accession of Judual, Malo was elected bishop of Aleth, according to Bili. Judual sent for him, probably at the instigation of Samson, and he went to the king attended by seven clerics. At this point ensues the interpolation relative to Malo's consecration at Tours, and the interpolator has reproduced almost verbatim Bili's account of the dove appearing and sitting on Malo's shoulder at his ordination as priest.¹

Judual, the favourer of Samson and Malo, died in or about 580, and was succeeded by his son Judael. On the decease of that prince, about the year 605, his eldest son, Judicael, should have mounted the throne. Judael had left as many as sixteen sons. According to custom, these were put out to fosterage. The foster-father of one of these princes, a man named Rethwal, resolved on obtaining the succession for the boy Haeloc, who had been in his charge. Accordingly he attempted to murder the fifteen brothers of his foster-son. Judicael had but just time to escape to the Monastery of Gaël, and throw himself on the protection of S. Meven, who hastily shored his head and invested him in the monastic habit. Seven others escaped, but seven were massacred. Among the latter was a child whom his foster-father brought to Aleth and hid in the cell of Malo, absent at the time on the isle of Aaron. Rethwal reached the monastery at night, broke in and carried the boy away. A message was at once sent to Malo, who sped after Rethwal, caught him up, and implored him with tears to spare the child. In reply, the barbarous fellow had the boy at once butchered, and then flung the body at the feet of the bishop, who took it up and saw to its being decently buried. Under such a protector Haeloc grew up turbulent and unscrupulous. Irritated at the power and influence of Malo, and jealous of the amount of territory the monks had acquired and were continually acquiring, he threatened to sweep their monasteries away. Malo, at the head of his monks, sought and implored him not to commit such an outrage, but met with a rebuff. Shortly after this, Haeloc was troubled with inflammation of the eyes, and supposing that this was due to his threats against the monks, was frightened, and desisted from doing what he had proposed.¹

¹ "Sed mirum in modum claritudinis, ex qua hora episcopus manum suam super caput ejus levare cepit, alba columba super scapulam ejus dextram usque ad horam qua officium completeretur, illis sacerdotibus, qui simul ibi advenissent videntibus, apparuit." Vita B, c. 14. "Sed mirum in modum ex qua hora episcopus manus suas super caput ejus levaverunt, alba iterum columba super collum ejus, . . . apparuit. Et quando ille cum sua benedictione ordinationeque completa se erigit, videntibus omnibus . . . in coelo volavit." Ibid., c. 51.

It is related that Malo was very fond of flowers, and that round his cell in summer the air was sweet with their perfume. He had vines planted, and a pretty story is told of how in spring, when hot, and gardening, he hung his hood on a vine. When he went to resume it, a wren flew out; and on looking into his hood, he found that the bird had laid an egg therein. He refused to allow his cowl to be removed, and the little creature deposited there the rest of her eggs and hatched them out. Not till the brood had flown would Malo take back his hood. Much of his time Malo spent in the isle of Aaron, attended by his serf Rivan, and he had with him an ass which he kept to bring to his cell the necessaries of life, fuel and such things as were carried over from the mainland. He had also a horse for his own riding.

The people living on Aaron played on him a practical joke. They got hold of Rivan, and carried him down to the sands, where they pegged down his arms and legs so that he lay there unable to stir, as the tide rolled in. Then a message was despatched to Malo to invite him to descend to the shore and see the plight in which Rivan was placed. Malo scrambled on to his horse and rode down to the shore, where he found his servant in a helpless condition before the tide, already lapping round him. Malo wrenched the bonds away, and made the frightened fellow, whose limbs were numbed, mount his horse and ride home, whilst the people looked on and jeered: "If you put your servant on your horse, next take the horse to be your bedfellow."²

The ringleader of these jokers was one named Guorguc. Malo could not appreciate the fun of the proceeding; he flew into a rage, and cursed the man and all his descendants to the ninth generation.³

During the many years that Malo laboured at Aleth, according to Bili, who may be drawing on his imagination as to what ought to have been, "the people were gathered to church on the appointed days, the festivals of the Saviour were celebrated with great joy. Charity was largely dispensed. The Word of God was daily preached to the people in diverse places. The clergy sang hymns to the praise of God, at the canonical hours in the churches he had built."¹

¹ Bili calls the prince Rethwald as well as his foster father, and, as an instance of the disorder into which his "Life" is thrown, tells the story of the threat before he relates the murder of the little prince, and these incidents several chapters before the meeting with Conmore.

² "Tuum equum in tuo cubiculo accipe." Vita B, c. 55.

³ "Illum hominem, Guorgucum nomine, usque ad nonam generationem qui contumeliam sibi fecerat, maledicens." Ibid., c. 56.

There seems to be no doubt but that S. Malo was endowed with superabounding energy. His vehemence, and violence when offended and contradicted, took the direction of impassioned evangelistic work where he met with response. As he rode on his rounds he shouted the psalms of the cursus, or canonical hours.² To recite them quietly did not comport with his character. He made the circuit of the country over which he exercised jurisdiction, "and converted innumerable men from error and the profane cult of idols,"³ and doubtless swore at and cursed those who were not pervious to his exhortations. He was strict in examining into the moral qualifications of candidates for the priesthood, and as the profession of an ecclesiastical life offered considerable advantages, escape from taxation and service to the prince in war and peace, many eminently unsuitable men offered as candidates. These Malo rejected, when he was made aware of their past stories; and as this is spoken of by Bili as remarkable, it implies that such nicety in selection was not common. S. Malo founded a monastic centre at Raus, the situation of which cannot now be determined.

As S. Malo became aged, he retreated more and more to the islet of Aaron, and his temper, always impatient of opposition, became excessively irritable. On one occasion, when he was wandering beside the Rance, a boor jeered at him. "So ho! going about seeking holes and corners in which to pray! I warrant you, looking after pretty wenches!"⁴ Then snatching at the bishop's cloak, he pulled it off, and taking it home used it as a coverlet to his bed, in which he lay with his wife and daughter. But his conscience reproached him, or else he feared to incur the malediction of the prelate, and next day he took back the mantle. Malo would be appeased by an abject apology only; as to the cloak, he refused to wear it any more and cast it to a beggar. A wren might nest in his hood, but a cloak thrown over a peasant's poor bed was defiled and unfit for his shoulders.

¹ Vita B, c. 90.

² Vita A, c. 61.

³ Ibid., c. 91.

⁴ "Obviavit ei vir malignus qui irridebat eum et dicebat eum non causa orationis sed causa mulieris ambulare. Et exuens eum pallio suo, et minans cum fuste quam in manu gerebat, et exiens ad domum tulit pallium ejus secum posuit super se dormiens et super uxorem et super filiam suam . . . mane et cito pallium viri Dei ad illum missum est. Et accepit ille et pauperi tribuit, estimans non esse dignum illud vestimentum, quod fuerat super rusticos homines, indui se." Ibid., c. 79.

One chieftain was a cause of trouble to S. Malo, as he had married a woman within the prohibited degrees. S. Malo gave him no rest, denounced him, expostulated, threatened him. One day at table, some of those present spoke of the persistence of the bishop against the marriage. "If I had him here," said the chief, "I would box his ears." However, in time the man gave way, did penance and turned his wife adrift; very probably having tired of her, and cast his eye on another comely woman.¹

The miracles wrought by S. Malo are of the stereotyped kind; only one or two beside that of Corseul are of any interest. A man had an attack of what we should call English cholera, and was in a very bad way (dejectis pene vitalibus); he sent to implore S. Malo to send him the eulogiæ, i.e., bread presented for the Sacrifice and blessed, but not consecrated. Malo sent him some, and the man was healed.²

A man was linked to a wife, who, for six years, had not talked and let him hear the clack of her tongue. Instead of rejoicing in such a privilege, he went to S. Malo and entreated him to cure his wife. The Saint put his fingers into her mouth and healed her. We are not told the sequel, whether the husband remained pleased with the result, or whether he rued it.

S. Malo paid a visit to S. Columbanus at Luxeuil, and remained with him some days, discussing Scripture and enjoying congenial society. He soon after had the pleasure of greeting a settler from Wales, though not from the same part as himself. This was Tyssilio or Suliau, flying from the vexations caused by his widowed sister-in-law, who sought to marry him. Suliau came ashore at Aleth, and was advised by Malo to take up his abode in the isle of Aaron, and this he did for awhile, but desiring retirement greater than he could obtain there, and perhaps not caring to be so near Malo, and subject to his temper and interference, he retired up the Rance to the spot which now bears his name.³

The prince Haeloc had begun his career by violence.⁴ He had menaced the monastery of Raus, founded by S. Malo, and had perhaps actually destroyed it. He had violated the sanctuary of S. Meven in Gaël. But in course of time he came to see that it was to his interest

¹ Vita A, cc. 88, 89.

² Ibid., c. 86.

³ Life in Albert le Grand, Vies des Saints, ed. 1901, p. 484, from a Life now lost that was preserved in the Church of S. Suliau-sur-Rance.

⁴ As already noticed, in the copy of Bili extant, the name is Rethwal. But this is a slip of the copyist. The name Rethwal is given in the ensuing chapters as that of the nutritor of the prince. The Saintes biographer calls the prince Haeloc, and the Marmoutier abridgement of Bili has Haeloc in this place and not Rethwal. De la Borderie, Hist. de Bretagne, i, p. 472.

to be on good terms with the Saints. They wielded immense power, and he had before his eyes the instance of Conmore, routed and slain through their machinations. Bili pretends that Haeloc was converted by the exhortations of Malo. That may or may not have been the case. Anyhow, he no longer openly menaced him. He died about the year 614, and at once ensued a period of anarchy. Judicael had been shorn and made a monk malgré lui; and now he cast aside his cowl, let his hair grow, assumed the crown, and looked about for a wife.

According to the anonymous Life, "After the death of Haeloc, the duke who had protected the blessed bishop Machlovus with all honour, there rose up a generation opposed to the holy man, burning with envy and treachery, because the man of God had got into his grip a large extent of land, granted to him and to God by the faithful. And they declared that the bishop Machlovus, he and his, had laid their hands on the whole country, and that nothing was left for themselves and their children in the future."¹

That S. Malo had been intolerably grasping seems evident. He now encountered insult and abuse wherever he went; his monks and serfs were attacked and beaten and his estates pillaged. The Alethans made no secret of their desire to be rid of him.² Although he affected to disregard the reproaches cast at him, he became vastly irritated, the more so as he was conscious that he had provoked resentment by his rapacity. Bili admits that he was as cordially detested by some as he was loved by others; and we are not bound to believe Bili, that it was the wicked people only who hated him. His impetuosity of temper, and his rough tongue, had provoked much prejudice, and his insatiable rapacity had irritated most of the people.

At length he thoroughly embroiled himself with his diocesans. The discord grew so great that Malo resolved on leaving Aleth altogether. But he did not withdraw graciously. He had a ship prepared, and taking with him thirty-three companions, embarked, and, as a parting farewell, hurled excommunication and his curse on diocese and diocesans.³

¹ "Post mortem Hailoc ducis Britanniae, qui beatum antistitem Machlovum cum omni honore custodivit dum diu vixit, surrexit impia generatio ipsius provinciae adversus sanctum virum, invidia omnique dolo ardentis pro eo quod homo Dei tantam possideret terram a fidelibus Deo sibi que largitam." Vita A, c. 21.

² "Aiebant namque inter se praesulem Machlovum totam possidere patriam, nihilque sibi neque filiis suis crastino tempore residere unde valeant vivere. . . . Homines suos graviter cedebant cunctaque sua vastabant, cupientes sanctum fugere regnumque illud penitus deserere." Ibid.

³ "Vir Dei, beatissimus Machu, sceleratorum hominum non sufferens angus-

Among those who accompanied him were seven whom he had brought with him from Wales, and were of his own age. Malo skirted the north coast of Brittany, doubled the point of Finistère, putting into ports on his way, and founding monastic cells, in which he left some of his disciples; and in course of time arrived at the little island of Aix, opposite where is now La Rochelle, and there for a while he remained. The bishop of Saintes at this time was Leontius, and Malo deemed it expedient to visit him. He found Leontius in the island of Eura, now Ayre, over against Marennes. He was well received, and Leontius gave up for his use a church "in villam quæ dicitur Brea, quæ est in parochia Santonicæ civitatis"; probably Burie, a few miles from Saintes. Malo accordingly moved thither, and a happy accident occurring on the third day after his arrival, predisposed the people in his favour. A little boy, going to a well with a pitcher, fell in, and was drawn out insensible. Malo having spent the greater part of his life by the sea, knew how those should be treated who were half-drowned, and by his attention and through his experience, the child was brought round; and the simple people thought that he had performed a miracle.

There is a fashion in religion as in everything else, and a rush was now made to Brea to see the bishop and induce him to attempt cures. Malo was troubled by the concourse, and retreated to Mancras, near Saujon, where the flat sandy land is covered with forest.

After Malo had been away from his diocese nearly seven years, a deputation from Aleth arrived to entreat his return. The land had suffered from drought, affecting the crops, and it occurred to the people that this was probably due to the imprecations called down on them and the land by the prelate, and that it would be advisable to bring him back to withdraw his curse.¹

He could not in decency refuse, and so started on his return. No sooner did he approach the Rance than the rain came down in torrents. Crowds came forth from Aleth to receive him with demonstrations of respect and joy, and he solemnly revoked his curses. Malo was now urged to remain, but after a visit to his favourite retreat at Aaron, tias, a perniciosis contactibus mundi se subtrahens, maledicto excommunicato populo," etc. Vita B, c. 92.

¹ "Ex Britannia missi a rege et a senioribus populi ad eum accesserunt, rogantes ut ad terram hominesque, quos excommunicans maledixerat, illuc iterum pergeret ut, unde maledictionem sua perfidia acceperant, inde per oris ejus eloquium benedictionem recipere mererentur." Ibid., c. 101. "Venerunt ad . . . pastorem quidam viri a tota regione Britannia missi, preces omnigenas offerentes quatenus sua reversione et benedictione recrearet sui patriam male perditam ob sui maledictionem, quam irato animo effudit tam super terram quam super habitatores ejus." Vita A, c. 28.

he declared his intention of returning to the Saintonge. Great was the regret expressed, and perhaps felt, and the old man started on his way back. But at his age he could hardly endure much travelling, and he broke down at Archingeay, near S. Jean d'Angély, a day's journey from Saintes; he took to his bed and died there on Sunday, November 15, after three days' illness.¹

Leontius, on hearing of his death, hastened to Archingeay, and carried off the body to Pardina, outside the walls of Saintes, now the faubourg Saint Macoult, where he erected a basilica over his remains. This was destroyed in the wars of the fifteenth century, but a little chapel dedicated to S. Malo has been recently erected on the site.

On considering the quality and value of the two Lives of the Saint that we possess, it can hardly be doubted but that they paint a personality of much force of character and great individuality. They differ from those banal Lives composed in the cloister, which present for our admiration but a shadow of a man without characteristic traits. Malo himself stands out on the canvas painted from life, and although the picture has suffered much from daubing and re-touching in later times, yet the vigorous outlines remain unaffected.

We come now to a difficult problem, the chronology of the Saint's Life. The first date to fix is that of his death.

He died on November 15. In order that this day should fall on a Sunday, the year must have had for its dominical letter D or ED. The year 621 has D as its dominical. He was buried by Leontius, Bishop of Saintes, who attended the Synod of Rheims in 625. His predecessor Audobert attended the Synod of Paris in 614. Venantius Fortunatus, who died in 600, wrote a hymn (i. 3) on the reconstruction by Leontius of the Church of S. Eutropius at Saintes. Leontius must have done this before he became bishop.

Bili says, and so does the Saintes biographer, that Malo died at the age of one hundred and thirty-three years. But such a length of life is clearly impossible. Thirty-three is a number affected in his Life. Malo was given thirty-three lads at Llancarfan to attend him; and the same number of disciples accompanied him when he left Aleth. Moreover, of these thirty-three, seven were of the same age as himself, so that we are given to suppose that eight lived to this prodigiously advanced age, which is absurd. Now, Malo had been not quite seven years in voluntary banishment when the deputation arrived to recall him to Aleth. He remained there but for a brief period, and then hurried back in the same year to the Saintonge.

¹ "Terræ vero matri redidit corpus humandum, septimo decimo Kalendas Decembris," Vita A. "Dominica nocte," Vita B.

This gives us the date 614-5 for his departure from Aleth in banishment. This was just after the death of Haeloc, which is supposed to have taken place in 613 or 614.

The arrival of Tyssilio, and his welcome by Malo, must have occurred very shortly before he left.

In 600 Columbanus was driven from Luxeuil by Brunehild; consequently Malo's visit to him took place before that date. The Paschal meeting of Malo and Conmore cannot be fixed later than 555.

Malo had been forty years bishop of Aleth before he abandoned his see, and that gives 574-5 as the date when his monastic settlement was transformed by Judual into an episcopal see. He was forty years old, says Bili, when he arrived at Césambre, ut dicitur. Now his arrival there was probably in 547, flying from the Yellow Plague; but he cannot have been forty years old; indeed, his biographers represent him as a young man, disobeying his parents, when he quitted Lllancarfan for Brittany. If we suppose that he was then a recently ordained priest, this gives him an age under a hundred years. If he were young when he left, after the cessation of the Yellow Plague in 550, when Teilo and so many other Saints returned to Wales, he may have gone back with them, and then been ordained priest at Lllancarfan. He returned to Aleth after that, when aged forty, and made a second halt at Césambre.

With regard to his consecration as bishop, the anonymous biographer makes Malo undertake two voyages, and fixes his consecration as bishop after the first. We may well suppose that he made more than two visits to Gwent. He had a foundation there, S. Maughan's, and he would need recruits for his Alethan houses. When Judual elevated Aleth into an episcopal seat, he may have gone back to Gwent to be consecrated.

There is still a difficulty to be surmounted. He was cousin to S. Samson. Now the Saintes biographer says that his mother Dervela was aged sixty-six when she bore him. Here, again, we have the thirty-three, and this time doubled. Bili states her age as forty. No trust can be placed in either statement. Dervela may have been the youngest sister of the family. The date of Samson's death we do not know, but it was some years after 556 or 557. It was probably about 565. But this makes an interval of fifty-six years between two men of the same generation. An alternative date assigned for the death of Samson is 576, reducing the time to forty-six years. But we cannot rely on the parentage of Malo. The Welsh give as his father Caradog, son (correctly father) of Ynyr Gwent, whereas the Saintes biographer makes him son of Gwent, meaning, apparently, Ynyr Gwent ; and in the Life of S. Tathan, as already shown, Ynyr is represented, not as the father, but as the son of Caradog.

It is remarkable that, although Malo lived so near Dol, there is no mention in either Life of his associating with his kinsman, Samson.

Reference has been already made to Leland's notes from a copy of Bili, that he saw, but which is now lost.

Leland's notes are as follows :—

" Machutus venit ad Corsult, ubi juvenem defunctum vitæ restituit. Cunmor dux tunc temporis Domnonicæ regionis. Corsult

* Una die, petierunt palatium Philiberti regis—

7 Britonum episcopi, videlicet Sampson, Machu, Paternus, Courentinus, Paulus Ninanus (Aurelianus), Fabu (Pabu) Tutuallus, Briomelius.

* Lupercus quidam pœnitentiam a Machuto coram Filiberto rege accepit, et terras suas dedit sedi S. Machuti.

* Machutus Romam petiit.

* Canalchus insula, nunc S. Machuti.

Machutus venit ad Leontium episcopum fugiens a suis, quos propter scelera maledictione mulctaverat."

And after the last chapter of Bili in the Second Book, with which the MS. as we now have it concludes, Leland adds :—

* " Tathu, frater S. Machutis, cui altare consecratum fuit in monasterio de Nantcarvan, sito in patria qua natus fuit S. Machutus.

* Alanus, dux Britonum.

* Guormhelm comes in Cornavia.

* Ego Bili episcopus, etc."

The " Bili episcopus " must be either an addition or be due to a re-edition of the Life by Bili when he became bishop of Vannes, if the Bili, Bishop of Vannes 890-910, be the same person.

The paragraphs to which an asterisk is attached refer to passages not found in the extant MSS. of Bili's Life of Malo. Philibert stands for Childebert II. The visit to Rome was an insertion at a time when it was deemed advisable to make the Celtic Saints enter into relations with the Holy See, so as to clear them from the imputation of schism. This was also in the copy from which John of Tynemouth made his compendium ; and he goes on to relate how that Malo, seeing captives and boys for sale in the market at Rome, bought them and baptised them ; and how that, on his way back to Aleth by sea, his ship was overtaken by a storm, whereupon S. Peter appeared, and encouraged Malo with assurance that he should not be wrecked.

This is an adaptation from Acts xxvii. 23, 24.

There is another miracle about bread in John of Tynemouth, that is not to be found in extant copies of Bili's Life. We see, accordingly, that this Life has gone through amplifications and curtailments; it certainly has undergone as well notable falsifications.

As to the visit of Samson, Malo, Padarn, Corentine, Paul of Léon, Pabu Tudwal, and Brioc, it is impossible to admit that they all attended on Childebert the same day or year. M. de la Borderie says, "Probablement Leland a mal compris Bili, dont les phrases, les constructions, sont souvent—on peut le voir—fort embrouillées. Bili . . . avait cru devoir rappeler que tous les fondateurs des évêchés bretons étaient allés comme Malo, visiter ce prince, et grâce aux obscurités du style, Leland a compris (à tort) qu'ils s'agissait là d'une visite actuelle, simultanée de ces sept apôtres."¹ Childebert died in 558, and probably Malo went to Paris immediately after the fall of Conmore to receive the confirmation of the grants made to him by Judual.²

We would suggest a scheme of chronology of the Life of S. Malo, but the only date that is certain is that of his death.

S. Malo born	not earlier than	525
„ quits Wales on the outbreak of the Yellow Plague		547
„ returns to Wales, and is ordained priest	c.	550
„ revisits Armorica and settles at Aaron	c.	552
The Paschal Celebration before Conmore at Corseul, March 28		555
Defeat and death of Conmore, and elevation of Judual close of		555
S. Malo goes to Paris to have the grants of lands confirmed	c.	556
„ goes to Llancarfan to obtain assistants	c.	557
Judual transforms the monastery of Aleth into a See, and S. Malo consecrated in Wales	c.	578
Visit to Luxeuil	before	600
Death of Judual and usurpation of Haeloc	c.	605
Arrival at Aleth of S. Tyssilio	c.	610
Death of Haeloc, succeeded by a period of anarchy	c.	614
S. Malo deserts Aleth and settles near Saintes	c.	615
Revisits Aleth, and dies on his way back to Saintes Nov. 15		621

S. Machu, Machutes, Machlovus, Maclovius, or Malo is in most Calendars on November 15; as the Sarum, 1521, that of the Preces Privatae, 1564, that of the Book of Common Prayer, the York, Hereford, Exeter, Oxford, Wells, Ely, etc., Calendars. An English Calendar in Saxon characters, tenth or early eleventh centuries; also in all the Breton Calendars, and in the Roman Martyrology. So, too, as Machudd, Mechyll, or Mechell, in some Welsh Calendars, from the fifteenth century, and those prefixed to the earlier editions of the Welsh Prayer Book and Bible.

The Translation of S. Malo on July 11; MS. Missal of S. Malo, fifteenth century, and Breviaries of S. Malo, 1537 and 1627.

¹ Bulletin de la Soc. arch. d'Ille et Vilaine, xvi (1884), p. 308.

² The name Philibert for Childebert is used pretty freely. In the account of the recovery of the relics of S. Malo by the people of Aleth, recourse is had to Philibert—perhaps the Childebert 695-711.

S. Malo is patron of numerous churches in Brittany. In Normandy, Picardy, Artois, Champagne, and the Isle of France he has churches dedicated to him.

In a grant of several churches to the Church of Llandaff by Morgan Hên (d. c. 974), King of Morganwg, are mentioned two Monmouthshire churches, "Lann Liuit Machumur," and "Lann Vannar de Machumur."¹ Machumur stands for Machu Mawr, i.e., S. Malo the Great. These two adjoining churches were dedicated to him. Llanllwyd or Llanllwyd, now extinct, was at one time a chapel under Llanvannar (now corrupted into Llanvaenor). To Malo is also dedicated the neighbouring church of S. Maughans. This and Llanvaenor are to-day under Llangattock-Vibon-Avel. S. Maughans is called in the Book of Llan Dâv, Lann Mocha (or Bocha),² and Ecclesia de S. Machuto.³

As already mentioned, Malo's name appears in Welsh also as Mechyll, or Mechell, and under this form he is the patron of Llanfechell, in Anglesey.⁴ Browne Willis⁵ gives its dedication as "S. Machutus alias S. Mechell. November 15." The Welsh genealogies, however, give Mechyll a totally different pedigree; they make him the son of Echwys ab Gwyn Gohoew.⁶

His legend, in the abbreviated form known to the Welsh, agrees generally with that of the Vitæ. There is a poem, Cywydd i Fechell Sant, written in his honour by an anonymous bard, which occurs (but a little imperfect) in Llanstephan MS. 125,⁷ of the middle of the seventeenth century. In it the panegyrist addresses the Saint as the son of Gwyn Gohoyw, of Llydaw, and of the royal line of Lludd ab

¹ Book of Llan Dâv, pp. 240-1. The original saint of Lann Vannar was very probably the "Banugar Sacerdos" whose name occurs on p. 228. L.P.

² Pp. 74, 171-2, 264-5, 272.

³ Ibid., p. 320. In the Taxatio of 1254 it occurs under the same name. In the parish list, c. 1566, in Peniarth MS. 147, as Llan vocha.

⁴ In the Record of Caernarvon, p. 62, occurs the following relating to Llanfechell—"Lanvighel cu' Hamel' de Botenol. Ead'm villa sim'l' cu' hamel' p'dicta tenet' de S'c'o Machuto."

⁵ Bangor, p. 280. A fair was held there on November 14, O.S.; latterly on the 25th. Mynydd Mechell is in the parish.

⁶ Hafod MS. 16; Cambro-British Saints, p. 268. In Cardiff MS. 25, he is entered twice—as son of Echwys ab Gohoyu, and son of Ethnwys ab Gwynn Gohoyw. One of the MSS. quoted in the Myr. Arch., p. 427, gives the name of his great-grandfather—Cynfarwy, of Cornwall. They give various corrupt forms for his father's name, such as Echwydd, Cochwyl, and Mochwys. He is unknown to the Iolo MSS. genealogies, but it is stated on p. 151 that his college, Côr Mechell, in Anglesey, was for a hundred Saints. In late documents Marchell, daughter of Brychan, occurs as Mechell and Mechyll.

⁷ For a modern Cywydd S. Mechell see Hugh Owen, Yr Hynafiaethydd, Amlwch, 1890, pp. 65-6.

Beli, who is credited with having given name to Caer Ludd, or London, and Ludgate. "He uttered naught in the cradle save the names of Christ, and he was instructed as he grew up by the One God and S. Brenda" (i.e., S. Brendan). His life was once miraculously preserved by "land being placed under him," whilst he peacefully slept on the tempestuous sea. He raised to life a giant whose body had long lain in the grave, his soul the while in hell (vferndan), and, baptising him, "converted his heart into a well of faith." Thieves he turned into stone, and Maelgwn's men and greyhounds, that had acted "foolishly," he put to death. "The lord of the luckless crew he, in his wrath, struck with blindness," who, on his sight being restored, gave the Saint "a free gift of land and strong men." The tract, now the parish of Llanfechell, was circumscribed by a hare, divinely aided in its course. The live coals that were meant to injure him he carried in his bosom unhurt. The author concludes by invoking the Saint to cure, from his grave, all sick persons, the maimed, and the blind. "A Paradise is his church, the dwelling-place of heaven's good grace; it was a stone structure when he returned to it from the seas, from fair Manaw." It had a statue of him, vested as bishop, in a golden cope.

The poem gives us to understand that he was buried at Llanfechell. It has also been supposed that he lies buried in the churchyard of Penrhos Lligwy, in another part of the island, where is a stone bearing the inscription: "Hic Jacit Maccudeceti."¹ Needless to say, it does not commemorate Mechell.

S. MANACCA, Virgin, Abbess

THE church of Manaccan or Minster, in Cornwall, was formerly a monastic establishment, probably, at its first institution, for women.

Manacca, according to popular tradition, was either sister or nurse to S. Levan.

In Bishop Stapeldon's Register, 1308, the church is called "Ecclesia Stæ Manacæ in Menstre." No Minster would be without a founder, but it is not easy to discover who the founder, or rather foundress, here was.

That she was Irish appears from the situation of the church, and from the tradition associating her with S. Levan. And, if there be any reliance to be placed on this tradition, then she belonged to the close of the fifth and beginning of the sixth centuries.

¹ Cf. the "Maccodeceti" on a stone now at Tavistock.

S. MANCUS.

Stained Glass, S. Neot.

The name Manacca is the same as Monaca, in Irish Midnach, Midhnech, or Midnat.

Now we do find that there was such a person placed by S. Patrick in a hermitage called Disert Patraic, where was a holy fountain, in the West of Ireland. Her principal church seems to have been Kilocan, the situation of which is not determined.

A statement is made by one Irish author that she was a child of Darerca, sister of S. Patrick. But we can obtain nothing approaching to certainty relative to S. Manacca. It is possible enough that Manaccan means no more than Minster, a monastic establishment. The day of S. Midnach is August 4 or November 18 in the Martyrologies of Tallaght and O'Gorman. Manaccan feast is on October 14.

S. MANACCUS, or MANCUS, Bishop, Confessor

LANREATH church, in Cornwall, is dedicated to S. Monach or Manaccus. William of Worcester says that he was a bishop, and that his body reposed at Lanreath. Lanlivery, in the same county, is said to be dedicated to him in conjunction with S. Dunstan.

In Bishop Stafford's Register his name is given as Managhan. He was probably Irish.

Lanreath Feast is now observed on August 3, although, according to William of Worcester, the commemoration formerly was on the Thursday after Whit-Sunday.

In the Young Women's Window, at S. Neot, he is represented in episcopal vestments.

S. MANCEN, see S. MAWGAN

S. MARCAN, Priest, Confessor

THE only things we know relative to this Saint are derived from the Life of S. Brioc, and these are few.

When Brioc was dying "a certain Marcan, a priest, filled with religious fear of God," had a vision. He beheld four angels, like eagles, with fiery wings, carrying away the soul of Brioc in form like a dove.

x h. obs for Nant March which MS. A MS. at Rouen not noticed by Dom Plaine, who has published the Vita Brioci, and is of the twelfth century, contains fragments of a metrical Life of Brioc, apparently by Peter, a clerk of Angers. This work, that is based on a much more ancient biography of the Saint, says that Marcan came from Ceretica, Ceredigion, and was therefore a compatriot of Brioc. None of the Breton dioceses, except that of Dol, commemorates Marcan; we may therefore suppose that he settled there, and in fact there is a small parish in the diocese that bears his name as patron, Saint-Marcan.

His day is May 21, according to the Dol Missal of 1502.

Some local legends relative to him are given by the Abbé Duine in his Notes sur les Saints Bretons.¹

S. Marcan is represented in the church near Dol, which takes its name from him, as a priest in stole and chasuble, a book in one hand, and the other hand raised in benediction. At the base is an ass being devoured by a wolf.

x In Welsh his name would become Marchan, which was once fairly common. There is a place called Llanmerchan, or Llanmarchan, in the parish of Llanychllwyddog, Pembrokeshire, where was at one time a pilgrimage chapel,² no doubt dedicated to Marcan.

Marcan was the Old-Welsh form³ of Margam, in Glamorgan, once the name of a considerably larger area than that of the present parish. In the *Vita S. Cadoci*⁴ Marcan is mentioned as one of the nine divisions of Glywysing, deriving its name from an eponymous Mar, son of Glywys. Later, it frequently occurs as Morgan, and is sometimes confounded with Glamorgan.

Then is also Llanfarchan, Carmarthen, - Church of Marcan

S. MARCHELL, Matron

THE Welsh Marchell represents two Latin names, Marcellus and Marcella, which has led to considerable confusion among late writers. Welsh hagiology, however, knows only of three female saints of the name.

The first in point of time was Marchell, daughter of Tewdrig ab

¹ Hermine, T. xxxi (1904), pp. 49-51; T. xxxiii, pp. 83-7.

² Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, pp. 346, 509. Marcan was also an Irish name. There was a Marcan king of the Deisi, who is mentioned in the Life of S. Findchua of Bri-Gobann, in the Book of Lismore.

³ Book of Llan Dâw, p. 224. For some Marchan names see the index, p. 411.

⁴ Cambro-British Saints, p. 20.

302 1 - Nant March

Teithfall, king of that district which was afterwards called (from her son) Brycheiniog, the Brecknockshire of to-day minus the Hundred of Builth. She was the wife of Anlach, "Rex Hiberniæ," by whom she became the mother of the "mysterious" Brychan. Her legend is told in the Cognatio de Brychan, for which see under S. BRYCHAN.¹ After her is named Caer Farchell, now a farm in the parish of S. David's. She sailed hence, from Porth Mawr, with her 100 men to Ireland.

The Iolo MSS. ² are the sole authority for her as a Saint.

S. MARCHELL, Matron

THIS Marchell was grand-daughter of the foregoing Marchell, being the daughter of Brychan. In the Cognatio and other early documents, her name is always written Marchel or Marchell, but in the later ones generally, Mechell, or Mechyll,³ through not observing the contraction mark. She was the wife of Gwrin Farfdrwch (with the Truncated Beard), the sixth century regulus of Meirionydd, a descendant, through Meirion, of Cunedda Wledig.

No churches are known to be dedicated to her.

S. MARCHELL, Virgin

THE virgin Marchell was the daughter of Hawystl Gloff and Tywanwedd, daughter of Amlawdd Wledig. She was sister to SS. Teyrnog, Deifer, Tyfrydog, and Tudur,⁴ all Saints, according to the *Iolo MSS.*⁵ of Bangor Iscoed until its destruction, when they went, with others, in a body to Bardsey.

Marchell is patroness of Whitchurch, or Eglwys Wen, the old parish church of Denbigh, anciently called Llanfarchell, by which name the parish of Denbigh was also known down to the fourteenth century

¹ I, p. 304.

² P. 118.

³ Peniarth MS. 75 (sixteenth century); Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 427; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 140. Late documents also convert her husband's name into Gwrgant and Cynyr.

⁴ Peniarth MSS. 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16; Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 118; Mostyn MS. 144, p. 329; Cambro-British Saints, p. 271; Myv. Arch., p. 427. Cardiff MS. 25, p. 118, mentions her as "y santes yssydd rhwng Dinbych a Chlwyd," but the pedigree given is wrong; cf. also Iolo MSS., p. 124.

⁵ P. 142.

and later.¹ Her brothers, Teyrnog and Deifer, are patrons of the adjoining parishes of Llandyrnog and Bodfari. The two brothers and sister, we may believe, settled in the Vale of Clwyd to lead an eremitical life, and had their cells on the very spots where those parish churches to-day stand; whilst their two other brothers settled in Anglesey and Montgomeryshire. There was a trio of Saints of the same family, who similarly established themselves near each other, in Anglesey, two sons and a daughter of Caw, viz., Eugrad, Gallgo, and Peithian, as we learn from the Life of S. Gildas, by the Monk of Rhuis. There is a figure of "Sc̄a Marcella," in fifteenth century glass, in the handsome chancel window of Llandyrnog Church. She is holding a closed book in her right hand, and a palm branch in her left. Edward Lhuyd, in his topographical notes (1699), says: "Ffynnon Fachell (sic) near Whitch: which is thought to be y^e Saint's Well." It is now dried up, but is remembered as a well. Lhuyd also mentions, among "the Chappels formerly in y^e Parish of Llanrwst, Capel Marchell in y^e Township of Ty brith isa." The chapel, of which there is nothing now to be seen, is believed to have been at Rhyd Lanfair, and is supposed to have been dedicated to this Saint.

It has been also suggested, but very doubtfully, that she gave name to the commote of Ystrad Marchell, "the Vale of Marchell," in the neighbourhood of Welshpool, where the Cistercian Abbey of Strata Marcella (a Latinization of the Welsh name) was founded in the twelfth century, by Owain Cyfeiliog. The Lordship of Ystrad Marchell embraced a somewhat large area, but the name is now borne by a manor only a little more in extent than the parish of Guilsfield.

The church of Marchwiell, in Denbighshire, is sometimes said to be dedicated to S. Marcella, on September 5,² a mistake for Marcellus, on the 4th, the second century martyr at Châlons-sur-Saône; and at other times to S. Marcellus, on October 7, an apocryphal first century Roman martyr; but there can be no doubt whatever that the church is dedicated to S. Deiniol, and that the Marchell dedication has been simply guessed from the parish name, which, in full, was formerly "Plwyf y Marchwiall."³ The two Marchell festivals that occur in Welsh Calendars are those of Marcellus Saints.

¹ "Llanvarcell," Taxatio of 1254; "Landwarchell," Taxatio of 1291; "Rectoria de Saynt Marcelle," Valor of 1535, vi, p. xxxix.

² Browne Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 363. Whitchurch he gives, p. 364, as dedicated to S. Marcellus, on January 16, an early fourth century Pope.

³ J. G. Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, pp. 33, 914. March-wiall means Saplings. In such compounds as march-feri, march-redyn, march-ysgall, etc., march implies something of a larger growth or kind than the ordinary.

S. MARCHELL.

From 15th century Glass in Llandyrnog Church.

S. MARTHAERUN, Confessor

THIS Saint was one of the sons of Brychan. His name is not entered in the Vespasian version of the Cognatio, but in the Domitian he is mentioned as "Marthaerun apud Keueilauc," and in Jesus College MS. 20 as "Marcharairjun (or Marcharanhun) ygkeueilyawc." Cyfeiliog is a commote of Montgomeryshire, which has Machynlleth as its principal town, and its name is preserved in that of the Deanery wherein that town is situated. The name Marthaerun has clearly nothing to do with Mathafarn, in the parish of Llanwrin, which is in Cyfeiliog.

In late documents the name is given as Mathaiarn,¹ and it is stated in a MS.² compiled 1578-1609, and in another³ compiled or transcribed about 1670, that he "lies buried in Ceredigion," a copyist's blunder, of course, for Cyfeiliog; but it was left to Meyrick⁴ and others to convert Ceredigion into the town of Cardigan, known earlier, and still in Welsh, as Aberteifi.

Marthaerun

S. MARTIN, Priest, Confessor

S. MARTIN in Meneage, Cornwall, is in the midst of Irish foundations, and it is possible that it may have been founded by the Irish Martin from Ossory.

This man was only Irish so far that he laboured in Ireland, and belonged to S. Patrick's mission, but he was a native of Britain. In the Homily on S. Patrick in the Lebar Brecc we read, "Patrick went into Ossory and founded churches and cloisters there" (this was in 474); "and he said that there would be nobles and clerics of the men of Ossory, and that no province would prevail against them so long as they should bide as Patrick willed. Patrick afterwards, bidding them farewell, left with them Martin, an Elder, and a party of his people, where is at this day Martharthech in Mag Raigne."⁵ Martharthech is the cemetery consecrated for the interment of the Middle Ossorian plain-dwellers, in the barony of Kells, co. Kilkenny.

Martin, accordingly, had the shaping of the church in Mid-Ossory. He did not, however, confine himself to this part of the kingdom, but also founded churches in Iſverk and in Upper Ossory.

27

¹ Also as Mathayarn, Mathaearn, Mathaern; Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 427; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 140.

² Myv. Arch., p. 427.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 119.

⁴ Cardiganshire, 1808, p. 111.

⁵ Tripertite Life, ii, p. 469.

Cíaran, who was at Saighir, held him in the highest respect. From the fact that he himself belonged to the expelled royal family, and that Ossory was in the hands of conquerors, who regarded him with mistrust, he was not able to travel about in Ossory, and was glad of the assistance of Martin, who, as a foreigner, was not looked on with suspicion. So highly indeed did Cíaran appreciate him, that he made Martin promise that, when they died, they should repose side by side.

Eventually Martin retired to Torry Isle (Tor Inis), off Donegal, and there died. A copy of the Gospels that he valued highly was laid on his breast when he was buried. S. Columba, of Hy, visited Tor Inis, opened the tomb, and carried off the sacred volume.¹

Great confusion has sprung up between Martin, the Patrician missionary, and Martin of Tours, that was furthered by the fact of the former being of Tor Inis and the latter of the "Turones." For instance, in the Life of S. Senan we are told that he visited Tours to converse with Martin, and he found the latter incessantly engaged upon a Gospel that he was transcribing. Then said Senan, "I would that these diligent hands of yours should minister the Eucharist to me on the day of my decease." "They shall indeed do it," replied Martin. Then the two men swore brotherhood, and, in token of affection, Martin presented Senan with the book of the Gospels he had been copying.²

Some years later, when Senan lay adying, "The angels of God uplifted Martin from Tours, in a heavenly cloud, and set him down in the place where Senan was biding, and he gave him Communion and Sacrifice." After which Martin was carried back to Tours in the same way.³ Now, as Martin of Tours died about 397, and Senan was born about 480, this is clearly impossible. The late redactor of the Life found in his original text that Senan had made friends with Martin of Tor Inis, who gave him a Gospel and ministered the Communion to him, and he jumped to the conclusion that this must have been Martin of Tours, and then he put in the above miraculous touches.

That Martin, who was a Briton, may have accompanied S. Cíaran to Cornwall is not improbable, and it is possible that the church of S. Martin in Meneage may be a foundation of this Martin. The Feast there is on November 14, six days after the day on which Martin, the Patrician Missionary, is commemorated at Temple-Marten in Ireland, but also three days after the Feast of Martin of Tours.

At Temple-Marten, near Kilkenny, is a holy well of the Saint.

¹ Book of Lismore, Anecdota Oxon., 1890, p. 175.

² Ibid., p. 208.

³ Ibid., p. 221.

S. MARUAN, Abbot, Confessor

MARUAN is said by Leland to have been one of the company that arrived in Cornwall from Ireland with SS. Senan, Breaca, etc.

Maruan is either a mistake by Leland, or of the printer, for Moruan. The Saint is no other than S. Ruan, or Rumon (see S. RUAN).

S. MATHAIARN, see S. MARTHAERUN

S. MAWES or MAUDETUS, Abbot, Confessor

THE authorities for the Life of this Saint are as follows:—

1. A Life that was employed in the Breviaries of Tréguier and Léon. Both have been lost, but a copy was made by the Breton Benedictines of the seventeenth century, which is now contained in a thick volume in the Bibliothèque Nationale, at Paris, MS. Fr. 22321. It has been printed by M. de la Borderie in Mémoires de la Soc. d'Emulation des Côtes du Nord, T. xxviii, pp. 202–9; and also as a separate brochure, Rennes, 1891.

This Life is composed of snippets for Lections in the Breviary. Pope Pius V (1566–72) ordered that there should be only three historical lessons in the Office of a Saint. The rest should be from Holy Scripture. Before that it had been felt that more place should be given to what was edifying and less to legendary fable, and this Life of S. Maudetus was curtailed from nine to eight lessons, the seventh being from S. Matthew, xxv.

The Life as given in the Lections bears manifest tokens of the scissors. It jumps abruptly from the departure of Modez from Ireland to his settlement on the Ile Modez. It gives two episodes connected with his disciples Bothmael and Tudy at full bulk, and leaves the main narrative incomplete with maimed head and no tail at all, for it does not mention the death of the Saint. Moreover, the introduction of lections from the Gospels necessitated considerable excisions, and so the Life of the Saint was mutilated.

This Life is in the main a very early composition, but to it is tacked on an episode concerning Duke Hoel of Brittany, that was written at the end of the eleventh century.

2. A second Life of the Saint, in this called Mandetus, is from the Chapter Library of Orleans, and is now in the Town Library, No. 330. It has likewise been printed by De la Borderie, in the same work.

This Life at Orleans owes its existence to the relics of S. Maudetus having been transported thither in the tenth century, when with them went the original Vita of the Saint. But in the thirteenth century, or perhaps a little earlier, it was recomposed, to put it into more polished shape. Happily this was done without excision of whole passages and incidents. It reproduces in portions the original text, which is found in the Vita Ima. This is a consecutive narration, but it labours under the disadvantage of having interpolated into it a commonplace fiction of Maudetus being offered the crown of Ireland, and a beautiful girl as wife, and praying God to afflict him with leprosy; his prayer heard, the Irish refuse him as king and the damsel declines to accept him as a husband. After that he recovers his former beauty. This is a hackneyed fable, and occurs also in the Legend of S. Fingar. The Second Life is not treated by M. de la Borderie with his wonted literary acumen. He regards everything in it that is not found in the First as a late interpolation.

The First Life, as already stated, consists of scraps only. The Second Life is a later composition than the First, but it is a re-writing in what the author considered as better style of the material found in the First Life, that he had before it was mutilated to convert it into Breviary Lessons. The original Life, which served as basis for both, was undoubtedly composed in Brittany, and the re-writer of the Second Life has kept all the local allusions and names. He gives the name of the estuary where Maudetus landed, "ad portum qui dicitur Banniged in Britannico, Latine vero Portus Benedictus." He relates how Maudetus settled at Lesheluan. He names the ruling chief; he says that he granted Lesvanalec to Maudetus. All this is no interpolation of the Orleans scribe; he found it in his original text. Moreover, his Vita is continuous, with no gaps, whereas, as already said, what we possess of Vita Ima is mere scrap work, serviceable enough for Lections in the Breviaries of Tréguier and Léon, but very imperfect as history. The Second Life contains, in brief, it is true, an account of the death of the Saint.

That in the recomposition the story has lost some freshness is not to be doubted, but without it, we should have but a very scrappy knowledge of the Life of Maudetus.

One of M. de la Borderie's arguments in depreciation of the Vita zda fails, and the facts tell in its favour. He says, of an account of an invasion of the minihi or sanctuary of the Saint by Tréguier robbers, "Aucun trait de la physionomie de saint Maudez; son caractère est là, au contraire, entièrement défiguré, calomnié. Ce rude Moine, qui s'exile de son pays d'origine, qui évangélisa tout le nord de l'Armorique et se retire ensuite avec quelques disciples, pour y vivre et mourir, dans une île sauvage, stérile, séparée du reste du monde par des courants périlleux et des grèves perfides,—voilà qu'on nous le représente comme un abbé de basse époque, brûlé de la soif d'augmenter le patrimoine du crucifix, c'est à dire, en bon français, les biens de son couvent." If M. de la Borderie had known anything of the character of the Irish Saints, he would have been aware that this was their dominant passion. Not, indeed, that they were ambitious on their own account; they were above that sort of vulgar greed; but because it was essential to their existence as evangelisers of the country to maintain the inviolability of their sanctuaries, and the safety of those who belonged to their tribe. "Unter den Krumstab ist gut leben," was a German maxim, and this applied far more freely in Celtic lands in the fifth and sixth centuries than in later Mediaeval times. The redactor at Orleans has, doubtless, given a more modern tinge to the story, but he has maintained the essential elements most carefully.

3. A Third Life is in the fifteenth century MS. Breviary of Tréguier in the Petit Séminaire of that town. It has likewise been printed by De la Borderie, pp. 225-7. It is of no additional value, as it gives the Life in six lessons, extracts verbatim from the First Life.

4. To these may be added a Life in the Léon Breviary, printed in 1705, an amalgam of the Second and Third Lives, with a few additions.

The Life of S. Modez in Albert Le Grand's Collection is made up from the Tréguier and Léon and Orleans Breviary Lives.

According to the Lives, Maudetus, also called in the Breviary of Orleans Mandetus, was born in Ireland, of royal race. His father's name was Erclaus, and that of his mother, Gentusa or Getusa. The pair had ten children, and as Maudetus was the tenth, he was given up to religion.

The Irish martyrologists have a Moduit in their Calendars; he was of Cill Moduit, and of the Hy Many of Roscommon. But this cannot be the same. Connaught sent no Saints to Wales, Cornwall and Brittany. Those who did come to settle were all from Leinster and Munster.

It is possible that by Erclaus may be meant Erc, son of Ercadh, and grandfather of Mac Dairre, of the Hy Bairrche. We know that the sons of Mac Dairre were expelled their country by Crimthan, King of the Hy Cinnsealach, and some of them went abroad. The period would agree fairly with the departure of Maudetus from Ireland, but he cannot have been the son, but the great-grandson, of Erc, if he were one of the Hy Bairrche.

The reason of Maudetus leaving Ireland may have been the breaking out of the Yellow Plague there, 547–550, which swept away his father, mother and brothers. When the hagiographers represent a Saint as leaving his country for the love of God, we are generally justified in looking for another reason, compulsion, either by some political convulsion, or fright caused by plague.

The biographers say nothing of a visit to Cornwall, but there he must have been, for he made a foundation on the creek of the Fal estuary where is now S. Mawes. Leland says: "Scant a quarter of a mile from the castel on the same side, upper into the land, is a praty village or fischartown with a pere, caulled S. Maw's; and there is a chapelle of hym, and his chaire of stone a little without, and his welle. They caulle this Sainct there S. Nat . . . he was a bishop in Britain, and (was) paintid as a scholemaster."¹ This would seem to imply that he was represented seated in his chair, with his pupils before him. These pupils, as we learn from the Vita, were Bothmael and Tudy.

Unfortunately in the reconstruction of the sea wall and pier, some years ago, the Chair of stone was built in, and is now no longer to be seen, but the Well remains, with a pointed arch, and the water for the little town is drawn from it.²

From Cornwall Maudetus or Mawes crossed over into Armorica. The Second Life says that he landed in the Portus Benedictus, or Porz Beniguet, the entrance of the Tréguier river, and that he brought with him his disciples Bothmael and Tudy. For a while they settled at Lesheluan, now Lesouan, near the port. This is probable enough. And here they received authorization to settle from Deroc, the prince of Léon, whom the Life calls Daeg.

This was most assuredly in the original Life which served as the basis of the Orleans redaction. It is not in the First Life, which was cut down to serve for nine Breviary lections. No Orleans redactor would have known the localities. And his ignorance of the history of Brittany is shown in the misreading of the name of Deroc.

Deroc was the son of Righuel, who had constituted himself Prince of Domnonia, and who received S. Brioc on his arrival. We learn from the Life of S. Leonore that Deroc was at this time ruling in Léon, with, probably, the consent of his father, who lived at Lishelion, on the Anse d'Ifignac.³ He was granted a site at Lesvanalec, near ¹ Itin., iii, 30.

² Quiller-Couch (The Holy Wells of Cornwall, 1894), did not see the well, and mistook another in private grounds for that of the Saint, and they give an illustration of the well that was not his.

³ De la Borderie regards this as an invention of the Orleans redactor. We the harbour. Maudetus soon gathered about him a number of adherents,¹ and he resolved on seeking a more quiet retreat, where he could train his disciples more at leisure.

There was an island off the coast at the mouth of the Trieux, in the archipelago of Bréhat, where the tide at fall retires to a great distance, leaving miles of sand, broken by rocks that bristle out of it, with pools about them formed by the swirl of the retreating currents. It was reported to be infested with serpents and venomous insects. To clear the soil of these, Maudetus set fire to the dry grass that covered the surface,² and then he crossed over with his disciples to it, and they constructed a series of separate cells, and a church of stone.

Shortly before crossing over, an incident occurred of a serious nature that called for the interposition of the Saint. Two of Deroc's sons had been playing with bows and arrows, and by inadvertence one of them shot his brother in the head and killed him. The boy was so frightened that he ran away and concealed himself in the woods. Deroc was wild with regret and rage, and in his fury might have beat the survivor to death, had not Maudetus interposed, and by degrees appeased his wrath, by representing the matter as the result of an accident. At last, when the father had come to view the matter in a calmer light, Maudetus communicated with the lurking boy, and he came forth from his hiding-place.³

Maudetus was wont to take a seat in the open air, where he had a chair, and there to instruct his pupils. Now it so happened that a great seal was wont to disport itself in the water near the isle, and the bobbing about of the great black head with its strangely human eyes distracted the attention of those he was instructing.

This happened so frequently that the patience of the abbot was exhausted, and taking up a stone, he flung it at the seal, with such good aim that he hit it on the head; and thenceforth the beast troubled him in his lessons no more. The biographer supposed it was not a real animal, but a demon such as the people called a Tulhe; that is, our Deuce.⁴

cannot agree with this view. The fragmentary nature of this part of Vita ima is marked; and, as observed above, the passage shows acquaintance with the localities.

¹ "Magna populi caterva comitatus qui salubribus ipsius sermonibus obtemperabat," etc. Vita ima, c. 5.

² "Fructa et vermes omnes vis incendii usque ad interiora radicum in cinerem convertit." Vita 2da, c. 15.

³ Ibid., cc. 12, 13. The biographer of course makes Mawes resuscitate the dead boy. That is his addition and invention.

⁴ "Quidam dæmon quem Britones Tulhe appellant coram eis apparuit in specie marinæ belluæ," Vita ima, cc. 11, 12. "Dæmones quos Dusios Galli nuncupant," says S. Augustine, De Civitate Dei, xv, 23.

One day the fire on the island had become extinct, and Maudetus sent his disciple Bothmael across to the mainland to fetch live charcoal. He went to a woman, who only consented to let him have it if he would carry the coals in the lap of his habit. This Bothmael did, and his habit was unsinged. What made this more wonderful was that the tide overtook him as he was on his way back over the sands, and he was forced to take refuge on one of the rocks that rise above the reach of the water except in a storm.

The story of carrying live coals in the lap is sufficiently common; it is reproduced in a great many Lives. It has been transferred from Bothmael to Tudy; it is told of S. Cadoc, and of S. Asaph and S. Caffo. It is not to be rejected lightly. There is a basis of truth in it, and it may well have happened to many. A fire had to be kept in, for if it went out, it was no easy matter to rekindle it. When extinguished by neglect or accident, a pupil would be sent to where was the nearest fire to ask for coals. He would probably take with him a pot to contain the glowing embers, and this pot he would carry with considerable precaution in his lap. If it did not upset on his way and burn his garment, the master would probably congratulate him on his having escaped damaging his gabardine, and this easily grew into being considered a marvel and a miracle.

On the mainland Maudetus had a church, now Lan Modez, which the biographer latinizes into Landa Maudeti. The people were much harassed by some ruffians, a piratical band which broke into their houses, robbed, and carried away their goods. In their distress they cried to their Saint to help them.

The day was one of sweltering heat, and the robbers had greatly exerted themselves, and were thirsty. They went to the nearest well for a drink. Then their leader, too indolent to descend from his horse, stooped from his saddle, and endeavoured to fill a drinking vessel from the spring, when, what with the heat and with this action, apoplexy ensued and he dropped dead on the ground. The rogues were alarmed, abandoned their booty, and retired. The people who had been plundered attributed their relief to S. Maudetus; and the biographer, to make the story more marvellous, fabled that fire leaped out of the spring and burnt the fellow.¹

The First Life ends abruptly after telling us the story of Bothmael

¹ "Prædicti prædones calore solis ferventes, siti mirabili coacti, quandam de armigeris ad fontem prædicti sancti, qui prope erat, propter aquam, ut sitim nimiam extinguerent, celeriter transmiserunt. Qui dum ad fontem perveniret et ab equo suo se inclinaret ut cadum suum de aqua impleret, statim, virtute divina cooperante . . . ignis mirabilis de fonte coram omnibus super eum prosiliit," etc. Vita ima, cc. 13, 14.

S. MAWES.

Statue at Ergué-Gaberic.

fetching fire from the mainland, but the Second says that Maudetus died on the fourteenth of the Calends of December (November 18). In the Life we are told that he crossed over in the days of Childebert, 507-48. This agrees with the date of the breaking out of the Yellow Plague, 547. As we are not told the age of Maudetus when he died, we do not know the exact date. It would be towards the end of the sixth century.

Local tradition has added to the story of the Saint. He is said at Henvic, in Côtes du Nord, to have brought over from Ireland his sister, whom they call Juvetta, in Breton Hulven.

On a mediæval diptych are statues of S. Modez, as he is called in Brittany, and S. Juvetta; also four bas-reliefs representing severally the story of S. Modez and that of his sister. The first give S. Modez healing the sick, receiving his father's blessing, casting out a devil, and restoring sight to the blind, blessing his disciples, and dying. The four others exhibit S. Juvetta restoring life to the dead, healing maniacs, giving sight to the blind, driving away the wild birds from a field of corn.

In Cornwall, the only dedication to him is S. Mawes; his chair and well there have been already mentioned.

In Brittany something like sixty churches and chapels have been erected to his honour. The list of these is given in the new edition of Albert le Grand's Vies des Saints, in additional notes by Canon Thomas.

Earth taken from the Ile S. Modez, and dust from below his statue, are regarded as a vermifuge. At Edern so much earth has been scooped from under the stone altar in his ancient chapel, that the altar itself has collapsed.

He is usually represented as a mitred abbot with staff. There is, however, a good early statue of him at Pencran near Landerneau, in which he wears no mitre, but a shaven head, and bears in his right hand a book, in the left a staff with octagonal knobbed head.

At Plogonnec, near Quimper, is a triptych, on which various scenes of his life are represented in bas-relief.

On the highest point of the Ile S. Modez is a sort of beehive hut, but large, and this is kept in constant repair as a sea-mark. It is commonly called Le Forn de S. Modez, or the Saint's Oven¹. Near it are traces of another circular habitation. The extension of the cult of the Saint, and the numerous churches placed under his invocation, seem to indicate that he did not remain always in his islet, but travelled about in Domnonia and Cornouaille, on mission work.

¹ De la Borderie, Hist. de Bretagne, i, p. 392. It must be admitted that it closely resembles a mediæval dove-cot. It deserves to be examined, to ascertain whether it was not really such.

In estimating his epoch we have only a few data to go by. We are told in his Life that he arrived in Brittany during the reign of Childebert, King of the Franks, that is, between 511 and 558. It was probably early in that reign, for his disciple Tudy passed from him into the monastery of Landevenec under S. Winwaloe.

In the Second Life, to which we are inclined to attribute more value than does M. de la Borderie, he is brought into association with Deroc, the son of Righuel, or Rhiwal, who ruled in Domnonia from about 515 to 520. This Deroc, as we judge from the Life of S. Tudwal, exercised some sort of authority in Léon during the lifetime of his father, whom he succeeded in Domnonia in or about 520, and ruled till about 535.

Whether the Pagi of Castell, Tréguier and Goelo were ever included in Léon we do not know, but they formed a portion of the old region occupied by the Curiosoliti. Accordingly we dare not say whether the intercourse between Maudetus and Deroc took place whilst he was prince or regent in Léon, or after he was king or chief in Domnonia.

There is not any allusion in the Lives to the troubles occasioned by the usurpation of Conmore in 540 to his death in 555, and we may therefore judge that Maudetus died in the first half of the sixth century, perhaps about the time when died Deroc.

There is now no Feast at S. Mawes.

In Bishop Brantyngham's Register, S. Mawes is entered as Capella Sti Mawdeti, 1381.

In Brittany his day is November 18, Breviary of Vannes, 1586, 1589; Breviary of S. Malo, 1537; Breviary of Léon, 1516; Missal of Léon, 1526; Breviary of Dol, 1519; Albert le Grand, and Lobineau.

But November 16, Breviary of Tréguier, 1779; Breviary of Quimper, 1783 and 1835. November 27 in the Léon Breviary of 1736, and that of Dol, 1775.

Gautier du Mottai says: "Saint Maudez, ainsi qu'on peut en juger par le nombre des oratoires qui lui sont dédiés, est le saint dont le culte est le plus répandu en Bretagne, après celui de Saint Yves."¹

S. Maudez or Modez is invoked against boils, and is offered a handful of slaters' nails, which must not be counted. His chapel at Trébry, Côtes du Nord, is near a dolmen that bears his name. The Pardon there is on Trinity Sunday. Near it is his Holy Well.²

¹ Iconog. Bretonne, p. 233.

² Sébillot, Petite Légende dorée de la Haute Bretagne, Nantes, 1897, pp. 72-3.

The stone boat in which S. Maudez crossed over the sea to Brittany is shown at Lanhiron on the Quimper river. His spring whence a flame issued to consume the freebooter is shown, and is supposed still at certain times to emit flames. A cave is also shown where he spent much time in retreat; in it is his bed, Gwele-sant-Modez, which is visited every year by pilgrims on the occasion of the Pardon. Every sailor is bound once in his life to visit the island of S. Modez under pain of risking shipwreck.¹

At Banalec, in Finistère, in the chapel of Locmarzin, is a statue of S. Maudez, and beneath it a hole about a foot in depth, formed by pilgrims who take thence pinches of dust or earth to put on their feet when inflamed, or to preserve them from inflammation.²

S. MAWGAN, Abbot, Confessor

THERE were several Saints who bore names very similar to that of this Saint, but there are two alone between whom we have to decide which is the Saint who came to Cornwall.

One of these is Maucan, Mancen, Manchán, or Monin, son of Dubhtach, chief bard to King Laoghaire. The other is Meugant, son of Gwyndaf Hên, first cousin to S. Samson. His mother was Gwenonwy, a sister of Anna, mother of S. Samson, and his father was brother to Amwn Ddu, father of S. Samson.

The Cornish Mawgan is most probably the former, because his settlement in Meneage is among the Irish colonists, and that in Pyder is almost in connexion with the chain along North Cornwall, within a few miles of Perranzabuloe and Crantock.

Another reason for the identification is that the Feast of S. Mawgan in Meneage is on the same day as that of the Irish Saint.

There can be no question as to which was the more important man of the two. The cousin of S. Samson lived at a later period; he died about the middle of the sixth century.

Maucan or Mancen, the Irish Saint, belonged to a family of professional bards, and, as already said, his father was the poet attached to the person of Laoghaire, the High-King of Ireland.

Dubhtach must have known something about Christianity before the arrival of Patrick, for, from the first, he warmly seconded the

¹ De Cerny, Contes et Légendes de Bretagne, Paris, 1899, pp. 15-22.

² Bulletin de la Commission Dioc. de Quimper, 1902, p. 282.

Apostle, who entertained the highest opinion of the poet, and consulted him in many of his difficulties.

Dubhtach contributed largely to the success of S. Patrick, in that he had the ear of the king, and that he was a man of wisdom and prudence. He used his best endeavours to disarm opposition to the progress of the Gospel, and Ireland has never thoroughly recognized how much she has owed to his good offices.

At the same time that Dubhtach was baptised, 447, his son Maucan was received into the Church.

When S. Patrick went into Tirawley, in Mayo, he converted the seven sons of the king, Amalghaid, or Awley, on which occasion twelve thousand persons followed the example of their chiefs. This abundant ingathering demanded a corresponding supply of labourers, and S. Patrick placed over them this same Maucan "surnamed The Master, a holy man, well read in the Scriptures, and a teacher of faith and doctrine." These epithets do not apply to him at this period, but describe the Maucan who was left in Tirawley, as he was afterwards well known as "The Master"—a great teacher of theology.

The Apostle of Ireland crossed between Waterford and Porth Mawr, in Pembrokeshire, about 468. In the Life of S. David we are told that the Apostle took a great fancy to the spot, where he could sit on a rock, afterwards called "The Chair of S. Patrick," and watch the summer sun go down in amber and gold behind the mountains of distant Waterford. He would have liked to remain there, but felt that the good work he had begun must be carried on and completed; and he went back to his duties. However, he seems to have fixed on this spot, within sight of Ireland, as a suitable site for a nursery of missionaries for Munster and Leinster. Over this establishment he placed Maucan.¹ In like manner, for Ulster and the whole North, a collegiate establishment was founded at Candida Casa, or Whitherne, in Galloway, over which S. Ninian presided. The house in Wales was Ty Gwyn (the White House), or "The Old Bush."

Ty Gwyn is situated above Porth Mawr, and about two miles from S. Davids. It stands on the south slope of Carn Llidi, the purple rocks above it springing out of the heath, with here and there a gorse bush, like a puff of flame breaking out of the crannies of the rock. Below it, near the sea, are the foundations of S. Patrick's chapel, on the site of his embarkation.

The foundations of the church at Ty Gwyn, the cradle of Christianity

¹ Rhygyfarch, Cambro-British Saints, p. 117, calls him Maucannus. Mr. E. W. B. Nicholson, in Y Cymmrodor, xxi (1908), pp. 92-3, identifies Maucannus with S. Mawgan.

among the Southern Irish, are trodden under foot by sheep and oxen, that wander over the wide cemetery where lie thick, in narrow coffins of unshaped stones, the bodies of the first inmates of that earliest Mission College in Britain. When we visited the spot in 1898, the farmer had torn up the grave-slabs of the tombs in the cattle yard, and the drainage of his cow-stalls and pig-styes soaked into the places where the bodies of ancient fathers of the British and Irish Churches had crumbled to dust.¹

Much confusion has arisen between the White House in Menevia and the Candida Casa in Galloway, as the names are the same, and those also of their first presidents are also similar. For Maucan is also called Ninnio, and Ninian was the head of Candida Casa. Incidents connected with one establishment have been transferred to the other. Another cause of confusion has been that Ty Gwyn has been supposed to be the same as the monastery of Ty Gwyn ar Dâf, or Whitland, which, however, was not founded till Norman times.

Let us now take in order the incidents in the life of S. Maucan. His conversion and baptism took place presumedly in 447. He was placed in charge of the new converts in Tirawley in 455. About 465 he was recalled and sent with his kinsman S. Fiacc to evangelize their relatives the Hy Cinnelach in Wexford. He went thence very shortly after to South Wales to organize the college of Ty Gwyn. In the Collections of Tirechan he is called Manchan, and in Lives of the Irish Saints he figures as Nennio and Ninidh. There can be no doubt as to these names belonging to the same person.

There is but one incident recorded relative to his work among the Hy Cinnelach. S. Fiacc of Sletty had a bad leg. S. Patrick heard of it, and sent him a chariot and a pair of horses, to enable him to get about. This aroused the jealousy of Sechnall (Secundinus), another of his missionaries, and he scolded Patrick soundly as giving way to partiality. But after he became cool, Sechnall repented; he had intercepted the present, and he sent it to Maucan, and begged him to forward it to Fiacc. This Maucan did, with an apology; but Fiacc, too charitable to receive a gift that had caused heart-burnings, restored chariot and horses to Patrick, and refused to use them.²

Maucan is called variously "The Master," as the great trainer of Saints, and "The Bard," as a member of an hereditary family of poets.

¹ Mrs. Dawson, in Archæologia Cambrensis, 1898, pp. 1-20, conclusively proves this to be the site of the Ty Gwyn the nursery of Saints and Missionaries. She wrote the article without being aware of the extensive remains of this early Christian cemetery, or that the foundations of the old church remain.

² Additions to Tirechan's Collections, Tripartite Life, ii, p. 347.

To him, but hesitatingly, is attributed a Latin hymn on the occasion of a plague.

Parce domine peccantibus
 Ignosce penitentibus
 Miserere nobis rogantibus
 Salvator omnium Christe
 Respice in nos Jesu, et miserere.¹

We next hear of him at Ty Gwyn, or Rosnat. He is named as its master in the Lives of the Saints who were his pupils.

In the Life of S. Tighernach the monastery is called "Monasterium Rosnacense, alio nomine Alba,"² and in the Life of S. Eoghain we are expressly told that "Sanctus et sapiens Nennio, qui Mancennus dicitur, de Rosnacensi monasterio,"³ received him and Tighernach. Another name by which the establishment was known was "Monasterium Magnum." It was one of those double houses that afterwards became common, and were introduced among the Northumbrians from Hy. The arrangement had great practical disadvantages.

For how long Maucan governed the college we have no means of saying. He was succeeded by Paulinus, who had been for a while his disciple.

It is remarkable that no date is given by the Irish annalists for the death of a man of so great importance, and this leads us to suppose that he died out of Ireland.

He is identified by Mr. Shearman (Loca Patriciana) with the Irish professor who carried into Armorica the Book of Cuilmenn. As no other copy existed in the island, a deputation was sent by the chief poet, in 580, to Brittany to recover it. This is probable enough. Maucan is venerated in Brittany as a founder of La Méaugon. It is also likely that an institution such as Ty Gwyn should have branches in Cornwall and in Armorica, as places for recruiting students and missionaries for the work undertaken by the mother-house.

The feast at Mawgan in Meneage is June 18. The day of the Saint's Pardon at La Méaugon is June 19. The feast at Mawgan in Pyder is July 25. This is the day of his commemoration in the Irish Calendars as Ninnio the Aged. There is in these Calendars a second commemoration as Mancen the Wise, on January 2. He is included in the Exeter Litany of the tenth century as Sanctus Maucan, and is placed between S. Winnow and S. Gildas.

The churches in Cornwall dedicated to S. Mawgan are but the two, one in Meneage and the other in Pyder. That in Brittany, Lan

¹ Liber Hymnorum, Henry Bradshaw Society, 1898, p. 24.

² Vitæ SS. Hib. in Cod. Salam., col. 213.

³ Ibid., col. 915.

S. MAWGAN.

Stained Glass at La Méaunon.

Méaugon, now La Méaugon, is in the narrow rocky valley of the Gouet, near S. Briuc. There is also S. Maugean in Ille et Vilaine; and possibly we have the name in the Lomogan of Ste. Sève, in Côtes du Nord. But see also under MEUGAN

In Art S. Mawgan should be represented in black habit, with a book and a staff, and with his foot on a harp, as indicating that he had abandoned the hereditary profession of bard for the Christian ministry and as teacher. At La Méaugon he is represented in stained glass, of the fifteenth century, vested in chasuble, and holding in his hands a pyx.

S. MAWNAN, Bishop, Confessor

THIS Saint has given his name to a parish in Cornwall. In Bishop Quivil's Register, 1281, he is called Sanctus Maunanus. In that of Bishop Grandisson, 1328, Robert Flammanke is called Rector of S. Maunany, but in the same year, in another document, Rector Sancti Maunani. So called in 1347, 1348, 1350, and 1361; also in the Taxatio of 1291, in the Registers of Bishop Brantyngham, 1381 and 1391; and in that of Bishop Stafford, 1398.

Mawnan is the softened Brythonic form of the Goidelic Magnenn. The Feast of S. Magnenn of Kilmainham is observed on December 18, and that of S. Mawnan on December 26.

At the re-dedication of the Church in the fifteenth century, it was given a second patron, according to the practice of the Bishops of Exeter, who endeavoured by this means to displace the old Celtic Saints. The new patron was S. Stephen, and the feast was then doubtless transferred to his Day, which coming immediately after Christmas, was near enough to the old feast not to wound the susceptibilities of the Mawnan people, and it obviated the unsuitability of keeping the Patronal Feast during Advent.

Mawnan is in the district colonized by the Irish; and although we do not know that S. Magnenn was in Cornwall, yet it is by no means improbable that he did visit it and had there a branch establishment, as he was a notable traveller.

Magnenn or Maignenn was one of four brothers, sons of Aedh, and was an intimate friend of S. Findchu of Kilgoban, S. Loman of Lough Owel, and of S. Finnian of Movice.

He was ordained Bishop, and when at home was at Kilmainham, but he was of a restless disposition, and was incessantly on the move accompanied by twenty-seven clerics, a peripatetic school, like that of the bards.

He visited Diarmid, son of Fergus, King of Ireland (544-65), and preached vigorously before him on the terrors of hell, and so frightened many of his hearers, that thirty of the court abandoned the world and became monks. The King, moreover, was so panic-struck that, to make his peace with God and the Saint, he granted him "a scruple on every nose, and an ounce of gold for every chieftain's daughter on her marriage."

Magnenn had a favourite ram that attended him on his missionary tours, and the Saint was wont to fasten his book of prayers round the neck of the beast, and make it carry the volume for him. One day a thief stole and killed the ram. Magnenn found out who was the culprit and went to his house, where he cursed him that his eyes should go blind, and his belly swell till he burst. The man was so terrified that he admitted he had killed and partly eaten the pet ram, and offered to do penance.

S. Magnenn paid a visit to S. Molaiss of Leighlin, who was wont, like an Indian fakir, to lie on the ground upon his face, with his arms and legs extended, and to howl. He was covered with thirty sores, and was enclosed in a narrow hovel.

Magnenn asked him why he lived such a horrible life, and Molaiss replied that "his sinfulness like a flame pervaded his body," and that he lived in this manner to extirpate his sins.

Magnenn enjoyed the privilege of solemnly burying the fellow.

He also paid a visit to an equally nasty Saint, Findchu of Kilgoban. "It was this Findchu who often times occupied a stone cell somewhat higher than his own stature, with a stone overhead and one underfoot, and two iron crooks, one on each side of the cell; on those he was wont to place his armpits so that neither did his head touch the stone above, nor his feet the flag beneath. He was wont also to lie for the first night in the grave with every corpse that was buried in the churchyard."

Magnenn seems to have relished visiting these monsters of asceticism. Another whom he favoured was Maelruan of Tallaght, whom he found in a well, up to his chin in water, lustily chanting the entire Psalter. When Maelruan got out, he took a brooch from his hairy habit and smote himself on the breast with it, and then invited his visitor to observe that from the wound made by the pin of the brooch, a liquid exuded that was pale in colour and not red like wholesome blood, "and that," said Maelruan, "is token that there remains very little pride in me."

Magnenn was so impressed, that he begged the Saint to hear his confession. Maelruan hesitated. "Do you exercise yourself in any manual labour?" he asked. Magnenn was forced to confess that he did not. His time was occupied in saying his Offices, and in wandering about the country. Maelruan then bluntly told him that he could not and would not minister reconciliation to a man who did not work for his daily bread, but lived on alms.

The visitor then humbly entreated the ascetic to give him at least some spiritual counsel. This Maelruan did in these words: "Weep for the sins of your friends and neighbours as though they were your own. Set your affections on God and things above, and not on persons and things below. Meditate on Mary, Mother of Glory, on the Twelve Major Prophets, on John the Baptist, and the Minor Prophets, together with Habaccuc. Think on the Four Gospels, the Twelve Apostles, and the Eleven Disciples, on the band of youths that attend on the King Eternal, the token of their service being a cross of gold on their foreheads, and a silver cross on their backs. Meditate on the Nine Angelic Orders, and on the bliss of the Heavenly City."

Maelruan then promised Magnenn that his fire should be as celebrated at Kilmainham as were the two other famous fires in Ireland, that is to say, those kept perpetually burning at Kildare.

Magnenn seems to have been inspired to imitate these austerities, and he allowed his body to become a prey to vermin. But one day he met S. Fursey, and the two Saints began to talk of their mutual discomforts. Fursey said that he was much bothered with dysentery. "If you will take my vermin, I will take your dysentery, and so exchange troubles," said Magnenn; and we are gravely assured that the Saints did thus pass over their afflictions to one another.¹

On one occasion, when wandering over the bogs and hills, S. Magnenn lost his way; night and rain came on, and no house was in sight. So he planted his staff in the earth, and he and his disciples attached their cloaks to it, spread them out, and all huddled underneath this extemporised tent, and spent in it a most miserable night. He, like most other Irish Saints, maintained a leper. His leper was a woman, and for her support he gave her a cow. A robber stole the cow. Thereupon Magnenn and his clergy excommunicated the thief with bell and book. Magnenn so roundly cursed the man, that some of his clergy interposed, and entreated the Saint at least to allow the wretch a nook in Heaven, however much he might afflict him with cramps and blains on earth. But Magnenn was inexorable. "Rather," said he, "so great is my indignation, that I seek to rouse

¹ Vita S. Cuannatheí in Cod. Salam., col. 936.

God's anger to increase the everlasting torment of the man hereafter." Then he burst forth into maledictions against such as should violate his privileges and sanctuary. "I curse them that they may lose the sight of their eyes, that they may die violent deaths, and that the gates of the Heavenly City may be shut in their faces."

Magnenn is also credited with having uttered a prophecy, which, it is the conviction of many, has been fulfilled.

"A time shall come when girls shall be pert and tart of tongue; when there will be grumbling and discontent among the lower classes; when there will be lack of reverence to elders; when churches will be slackly attended; and when women shall exercise wiles."

Magnenn is said to have studiously shunned the society and favour of kings, and to have interposed when he heard of war breaking out. He had a faculty of discerning the spirit of a man, after he had been three hours in his company, and deciding whether he was a sincerely good man or a hypocrite.

He could give good advice. One day he said, "Of all the absurd things I ever saw, was an old fellow haranguing his sons on virtue, when the rogue himself never exercised the least self-restraint."

He was himself unmarried, and was strongly opposed to clerical marriage, and said some hard things, and even extravagant things, thereon. Being such a rambler himself, he was able to give good advice relative to pilgrimages. He declared that the wish to visit a holy spot sufficed, if so be that he who desired to undertake the journey was detained by domestic duties. He strongly condemned those who proposed to themselves pilgrimages with the object of shaking off religious responsibilities and moral discipline such as they had exercised, but found irksome, at home.

It is quite possible that some of the extravagances attributed to Magnenn are due to the invention of the biographer of Kilmainham, who imagined the curses, so as to deter the violent from laying hands on the property of the monastery.

So many of his sayings exhibit sound sense and real piety, that we are inclined to doubt the genuineness of such as breathe a different spirit.

The authority for the brief notice here given is an Irish Life published in the Silva Gadelica, that is unfortunately incomplete, consequently we do not know the particulars concerning the close of his life. Nor can we fix, with any confidence, the date of his death.

Magnenn was a friend of S. Fursey before the latter left Ireland, which was in the reign of Sigebert of the East Saxons, in or about 637. He was also a friend of S. Findchu, who was a contemporary of Cairbre Crom, King of Munster, who died in 571; but Findchu was certainly older than Magnenn. The Maelruan he visited was not Maelruan of Tallaght, who died in 782, but Maelruan of Druim Raithe, in West Meath, who lived earlier. He is also spoken of as visiting Diarmid, King of all Ireland (544-65); so that probably Magnenn lived in the latter part of the sixth century, and died about 638. The story of his taking dysentery after a visit to S. Fursej may mean that he was prostrated after that visit, and died of it.

The only dedication to Magnenn in Cornwall is S. Mawnan. The church was given a secondary dedication to S. Stephen, and this may account for the transference of the Feast to December 26. It lies at the mouth of the Helford river, close to the sea, over against S. Anthony, with its camp on Dinas Head. The church is mainly Perpendicular, and has the remains of a fine screen with painted figures of Saints on it. There was a sanctuary attached to Mawnan Church, called the Lawn or Llan. At the extremity of the point is a rock called Mawnan's Chair.

The Church is situated in a circular enclosure, probably the original bank of the monastery, and in the "Lawn" is a Holy Well.

S. MECHELL, see S. MALO

S. MECHYDD, Confessor

IN one entry in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ Mechydd ab Sanddef Bryd Angel ab Llywarch Hen is given as a Welsh Saint. There is a mistake here, for Mechydd was not a grandson of Llywarch, but one of his twenty-four sons. He is mentioned in two poems in the twelfth century Black Book of Carmarthen,² wherein his steeds and his death are referred to, and it is added in the last verse of the first poem:—

Mechydd, the son of Llywarch, the undaunted chief,
Fine and fair was his robe of the colour of the swan,
The first that fastened a horse by the bridle.

He was a warrior and not a Saint.

S. MEDAN, Monk, Confessor

ONE of the disciples of S. Petrock, whose body, according to Leland, reposed at Bodmin.³ It is just possible that he may be the same as Mydan, grandson of Urien Rheged, and a disciple of S. Cadoc. This latter Saint visited Cornwall, and may have left Mydan there.

¹ P. 128; Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 280.

² Ed. Evans, 1906, pp. 93, 108.

³ Collect., i, p. 10.

S. MEDDWID, or MEDWIDA, Virgin

A FESTIVAL, entered against August 27 as "Gwyl Feddwid," occurs in the Calendars in Peniarth MSS. 187 and 219, the Iolo MSS., and the Prymers of 1618 and 1633 (the last as Foddwid). The name is in a mutated form, and can only stand for either Beddwid or Meddwid. In a will, dated 1530, a cleric of Bangor Diocese directs his body to be buried "in ecclesia Sancte Medwide Virginis,"¹ which is identified with the parish church of Clocaenog, in Denbighshire. Down to 1859 it was in the Diocese of Bangor, but is now in that of S. Asaph. Browne Willis² gives the church as dedicated to S. Vodhyd, with festival on August 27, and other spellings of the name are Foddyd, and Foddhyd. Sometimes the church is said to be dedicated to an imaginary S. Caenog,³ and also to S. Trillo, but it is perfectly clear that its real patron is Medwida, Meddwid, or Meddwyd.

The Welsh accounts know nothing of a Saint under that form, but we think she is none other than the Meddvyth of an entry in a Genealogy of the Welsh Saints which occurs in Cardiff MS. 5 (p. 118), written in 1527, and in Llanstephan MS. 81 (p. 2), in the autograph of Moses Williams (d. 1742), which runs, "Meddvyth verch Jdlos vab llawvrodedd varchawc." This is the only record of her name that we know of. Her father, S. Idloes, who is patron of Llanidloes, in Montgomeryshire, was, correctly, the son of Gwyddnabi, who was again the son of Llawfrodedd Farfog.

S. MEDROD

MEDROD's title to be regarded as a Welsh Saint rests entirely on one entry in the *Iolo MSS.*⁴ He was the son of S. Cawrdaf ab Caradoc

¹ Arch. Camb., 1876, p. 221.

² Bangor, 1721, pp. 278, 327. In a register at Clocaenog of moneys collected on briefs and otherwise is entered the following—"Collected to Jo^a. Robert Parish Clark of Clocaenog on Clocaenog Wakes viz. 27^o Die Aug. 1710 the sum of 4s. in y^e Morning and 8d. in y^e afternoon." The nearest approach to this Saint that we find in the Irish Martyrologies is Feidhilmidh mac Crimthain, who is commemorated on August 28.

³ ii, p. 49.

⁴ P. 123; Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 280. A proverb, formerly current in Glamorgan, plays upon the name, "Medrod-mab Angen yw'r Athraw Ysgol goreu'n y byd."

All 4854 f. 15
" St. Meddwy dedd L. K. Caerwyn " Llanc.

... 1876. The M
... 1721
... Oct 1897

Freichfras, the brother of S. Cathan, and the father of S. Dyfnog. He is not to be confounded with the better known, but dishonourable. Medrod or Modred, nephew of King Arthur.

S. MEDWY, Confessor

MEDWY, in Latin Medwinus, belongs, with Elfan, Dyfan, and Ffagan, to the group of persons who figure in the Lucius legend. The only Achau'r Saint that include Medwy are the three late Glamorgan copies printed in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ He was, we are told, "a messenger for Lleurwg (Lucius) to Pope Eleutherius, and was made a bishop in Rome;" and was subsequently bishop at Llanfedwy, in Glamorgan, of which he was patron. Llanvedw is now the township name of the Glamorgan part of the parish of Michaelston-y-Vedw. The church is extinct, having been burnt down in the wars of Iestyn ab Gwrgant in the eleventh century, and was never rebuilt.²

The churches in the neighbourhood of Llandaff dedicated to the reputed messengers of Lucius and evangelizers of Britain probably owe their dedications to genuine Welsh Saints, of a later age than the second century, whose names have been pressed into the legend.

Medwy's festival does not occur in any early Welsh Calendar, but January 1 is mentioned as his day.³

See further what has been said under the names of the trio usually associated with Medwy.

S. MEIGAN, Confessor

MEIGAN was, according to the Iolo MSS.,⁴ the son of Goronwy of Gwareddog, or Gwrèdog (in Arfon), who, with his brothers Padrig, Cyffyllog, and Garmon, was a Saint of Côr Beuno at Clynnog, in Carnarvonshire. Nothing further seems to be known of him; indeed, the authority for him is not above suspicion. Meigan, no doubt, stands for Meugant.

¹ Pp. 100, 115, 135.

² Ibid., p. 220. This seems to have been in 1069, when the battle mentioned as "Gwaith Llanfedwy" was fought; Gwentian Chronicle, p. 60. (Suppl. to Arch. Camb., 1863).

³ Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 86.

⁴ Pp. 143-4.

SS. MEIGIR and MEILIR

In a passage in a document relating to Cunedda and the partition of Wales among his sons, printed in the Iolo MSS.,¹ which has been unaccountably foisted among the saintly genealogies, we read: "Cynir, Meilir, and Meigir, the sons of Gwron ab Cunedda Wledig, went with Caswallon Lawhir, their cousin, to expel the Goidels and Picts from the Island of Anglesey, whither they had fled from the sons of Cunedda, and had established themselves in that Island. After furious fighting they drove the Goidels out of Anglesey, and Caswallon Lawhir slew Serig the Goidel there with his own hand."

This is the only reference to Meigir and Meilir that may be adduced in favour of including them among the Welsh Saints; but the passage is an unwarranted interpolation.

Meilyr or Meilir is the later Welsh form for Maglorius. Besides being a man's name, it is also the name of a tributary of the Arth, in Cardiganshire. Meilir is given by mistake in one entry in the *Iolo MSS.*² for Maelrys, the son of Gwyddno ab Emyr Llydaw. In the Calendar in the Welsh Prymer of 1546 Meilir is given against November 12, now in error for Meilic, later Meilig.

The church of Llysyfran, Pembrokeshire, is usually given as dedicated to a S. Meilir, but of him nothing is known, unless we assume that by him Maglorius is intended.

S. MEILIG, see S. MAELOG

S. MEIRION, Confessor

MEIRION, the Saint, was son of Owain Danwyn ab Einion Yrth ab Cunedda Wledig.³ The older pedigrees usually describe him as a Saint "in the Cantref," but that in Hafod MS. 16 as "in Merthyr Meirion, in the Cantref of the sons of Owain Danwyn," etc., i.e., Dunoding. By Merthyr Meirion is meant Criccieth Church, former known as Merthyr, and now dedicated to S. Catherine. He was the brother of SS. Einion Frenin and Seiriol. His name in the later documents is sometimes written Meirian.

The only other known dedication to him is that of the chapel of Llanfeirion or Llanfeirian, in the parish of Llangadwaladr, Anglesey. It is believed to have been originally a parish church. It was allowed to go to ruins in the eighteenth century, and has not been since restored. Tudur Aled, in an elegy, mentions "plwyf Meirian."¹

¹ Pp. 122-3; Rees, Welsh Saints, pp. 165-6.

² P. 133; Rees, op. cit., p. 222.

³ Peniarth MSS. 12, 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16; Myv. Arch., pp. 424, 427; Cambro-British Saints, p. 266; Iolo MSS., pp. 102, 125 (on pp. 110, 124, he is said to have been son of Einion Yrth). Meirion is the Latin Marianus borrowed. It occurs in Breton as Merion.

The festival of Meirian occurs in the calendar in the Grammar of John Edwards of Chirkland on February 4, but Browne Willis² gives it under Llanfeirian as on the 3rd.

Meirion, the son of Tybion ab Cunedda, is in one passage in the *Iolo MSS.*³ included among the Welsh Saints, but the foisted document in which it occurs is not of a hagiological character. His father Tybion, having been slain in battle, the cantref which should have been allotted to him on the Cuneddau conquest of Wales was bestowed upon Meirion—hence Meirionydd, Merioneth.

Mercedee is a place in the hills of Pamnes.

SS. MEL, MELCHU, and MUINIS, Bishops, Confessors

THESE were Britons who assisted S. Patrick in his work in Ireland. It has been supposed that Melchu is but another form of the name Mel, and that these were identical, for both are represented as Bishops of Ardagh, and both are commemorated on the same day, and as nothing is related of Melchu apart from Mel. But he is probably Maelog, who had a church not far from Kilkenny, in which town his brothers Mel and Rioc had foundations.

They are represented as sons of Conis and Darerca, and nephews of the Apostle of Ireland, but small confidence can be placed in the late genealogists who elaborated pedigrees of the family of Patrick.⁴

That they were Britons who laboured with him need not be questioned. Mel and Melchu are spoken of as Bishops from Britain in the Life of S. Brigid.

Mel settled or was placed at Ardagh, where he formed a monastery, and ruled as abbot and bishop.

He confirmed S. Brigid and bestowed the veil upon her.

He occasioned some trouble to S. Patrick, for he was accused to him of undue intimacy with Lupait, Patrick's sister, and his own

¹ Gorchestion Beirdd Cymru, 2nd ed., pp. 226-7; cf. the parish list in Peniarth MS. 147.

² Bangor, 1721, p. 280; Paroch. Angl., 1733, p. 215.

³ P. 122. There was also a Meirion ab Ceredig ab Cunedda (Jesus College MS. 20).

⁴ Chronolog. Tract in Lebar Brecc, in Tripartite Life, ed. Stokes, ii, p. 551; i, p. 83.

aunt, if it be true that he was son of Darerca. They lived in the same house, and there was much unpleasant talk about it, and the priests appealed to Patrick to put a stop to the scandal. Patrick came to Ardagh. Mel, alarmed at his coming, pretended to be out of his wits, and went fishing between the furrows of a ploughed field, that had been drenched by heavy rain.

"Fishing for salmon in ploughed land!" exclaimed Patrick; "God helps not an idiot."¹

He made arrangements that thenceforth men and women should live apart in the monasteries.

We know little if anything more of S. Mel. Lupait is said to have cleared herself of the charge brought against her by carrying hot coals in her lap. But on another occasion, apparently, it was otherwise. "Patrick was enraged with his sister, namely Lupait, for the sin of lust she had committed, so that she became pregnant. When Patrick came to the church from the east, Lupait went to meet him, and cast herself down on her knees before the chariot. 'Drive over her,' said Patrick. The chariot went over her thrice, for she still would come in front of it. Wherefore she there went to heaven at the Ferta, and she was afterwards buried by Patrick, and her requiem was sung."²

Whether these are mere idle legends, or are based on facts, we have no means of judging.

The best authority for Mel is to be found in the Collections of Tirechan, and he merely states: "Et venit per flumen Ethne in duas Tethbias et ordinavit Melum episcopum."³

A curious story is told in the gloss on the Félire of Oengus, that when Mel was veiling S. Brigid, he blundered, and in place of reading the office for consecrating a virgin, read that ordaining her a bishop.⁴

Of Bishop Muinis or Munis still less is known or told.

He left his crozier behind, hanging on a branch, one day, and when he lamented this to Patrick, lo! it was found before them, hanging to another branch. Then Patrick exchanged croziers with him.⁵ He was sent by Patrick to Rome to fetch relics, and, being of a forgetful memory, left them behind him one night in a hollow elm, and never recovered them.⁶ He was appointed bishop in Forgney in the county of Longford.

Bishop Mel is commemorated in the Irish Calendars on February 6.

¹ Chronolog. Tract in Lebar Brecc, in Tripartite Life, ed. Stokes, i, p. 89.

² Ibid., i, p. 235. ³ Ibid., ii, p. 310.

⁴ Félire of Oengus, ed. Stokes, p. lxxviii.

⁵ Tripartite Life, i, p. 83.

⁶ Ibid., i, p. 85.

Handwritten notes:
 ...
 ...
 ...

The Annals of Ulster give as the date of his death 488, according to Ussher.

He and Melchu, Munis and Rioc are commemorated on this day in the Sarum Calendar ; but Munis is entered in the Irish Martyrologies on December 18.

S. MELANGELL, Virgin, Abbess

MELANGELL is in her Latin legend called Monacella,¹ a name which is under either form, we believe, unique. She is identified with the Melangell who is entered in the Welsh pedigrees as either a daughter or a grand-daughter of Tudwal Tudclud, of the race of Maxen Wledig. The earlier, as well as the most authentic, pedigrees² make her his grand-daughter, her father's name being variously written Cyfelch, Cyfwlch, Cynwalch, and Ricwlff ; but they agree in giving her mother's name as Ethni Wyddeles. Tudwal was father also of Rhydderch Hael, who won the battle of Arderydd in 573. Melangell would, most probably, be his niece.

Her legend, Historia Divæ Monacellæ, has been published in the Archæologia Cambrensis for 1848,³ from a transcript made in 1640 from a MS. of at least the sixteenth century, in the Wynnstay Library, which was destroyed by fire in 1858. Also in Edward Lhuyd's Parochialia, from a Llanfyllin MS.⁴ It is believed to have been written by Matthew of Westminster ; it is in any case late.

Her legend relates that she was the daughter of King Iowchel of ¹ We cannot explain how the form Monacella came to be regarded as the Latin equivalent for the Welsh Melangell. Possibly the latter stands for Myn-Angell = Mon-Acella (imperfectly written for Ancella) ; or, the Latin may have been made out of the Welsh name by some one desirous of bringing in such a word as monac(h)a, a nun. There is a stream called Nant yr Angell in the neighbourhood, and another Angell in the Dovey Valley.

² Hafod MS. 16 ; Cardiff MS. 25, pp. 37, 120 ; Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 118 ; Myv. Arch., pp. 420, 428 ; Iolo MSS., pp. 113, 139. For Tudwal as her father, Peniarth MS. 74 (sixteenth century) ; Myv. Arch., p. 428. In Hafod MS. 16 (Myv. Arch., p. 416 ; Cambro-British Saints, p. 268) the pedigrees of Collen and Melangell are made to run in a manner that has led to no little confusion, Melangell becoming the wife of Pedrwn, and mother of Collen. For the name Ethni, see ii, p. 157.

³ Pp. 139-41.

⁴ Supplement, pp. 130-2, to Arch. Camb., 1909. There is a copy also in Gwallter Mechain's Miscellanies, i, pp. 63-8, in the National Library of Wales, and fragments in Cardiff MS. 50, and Harleian MS. 2059.

Ireland,¹ who desired to marry her to a certain Irish nobleman ; but she had vowed celibacy. She fled from her father's dominions, and secreted herself among the hills of Pennant (called after her Pennant Melangell), in Montgomeryshire, within the principality of Powys, where she lived for fifteen years without seeing the face of man, " serving God and the spotless Virgin." One day in the year 604, as we are told, Brochwel Ysgythrog, prince of Powys, being a-hare-hunting, pursued his game till he came to a great thicket, within which he was amazed to find a virgin of surpassing beauty engaged in deep devotion, with the hare he had been pursuing under the folds of her garments, boldly facing the hounds. He shouted to them, " Catch her, little dogs, catch her ! " But the more he urged them on the further they retired, howling.²

In answer to Brochwel's questioning she told him her history. " Because," said he, " it hath pleased the supreme and almighty God, for thy merits, to give safety to this little wild hare, I give and present unto thee these my lands for the service of God, to be a perpetual asylum, refuge, and defence, in honour of thy name '—assigning to her the spot as a sanctuary for ever.

Here she spent thirty-seven years of her life in solitude, and the hares had become so tame that they " were in a state of familiarity about her every day throughout her long life." She gathered around her a convent of virgins, with herself as head, and the privileges that were granted by Brochwel were maintained by his successors in the principality of Powys. Some time after her death a certain man named Elisse came to Pennant with the intention of violating the nuns, but he met with a well-deserved death.

The only church dedicated to her is that of Pennant Melangell, which is situated in a secluded but very beautiful valley. It was replaced in 1855 by a new and more central parish church at Penybont, dedicated to S. Thomas. In 1878 S. Melangell's was annexed to Llangynog.

Pennant became famous as a safe asylum for the oppressed, and also as a nunnery, but how long it so continued cannot be determined. Among the items returned in the Valor of 1535³ we have " Oblacion' ad reliquias—lvjs. viiijd.," that is, the average offerings at her shrine in the small rectangular chapel or oratory adjoining the east end of the chancel, still called Cell y Bedd, the Cell of the Shrine. This has a door and a window, but no entrance in to the church. There are portions of the carved stone work of the shrine built into the porch and south wall of the church and the lych-gate. Her relics have long since disappeared.

¹ " Regis Iowchel de Hibernia " (Wynnstey MS.) ; " Regis de Iowchel de Hybernia " (Llanfyllin MS.). Her father was, more properly, a Scotus of North Britain.

² Pennant, in his account, Tours in Wales, ed. 1883, iii, pp. 163-4, adds here, " Even when the huntsman blew his horn it stuck to his lips," which, no doubt, formed part of the original legend.

³ iv, p. 451.

The principal object of interest in the church is the carved woodwork representing Melangell's "tale humane," now affixed to the front of the west gallery, but originally it formed a cornice or frieze on the old rood loft or the screen which divides the church into nave and chancel. It consists of six compartments: (1) Brochwel, on horseback, with both arms extended, and brandishing a sword in his right hand; (2) the huntsman, kneeling on one knee, with the horn raised to his lips; (3) S. Melangell, seated on a red cushion and represented as an abbess—her right hand slightly raised, and her left hand grasping a foliated crozier; (4) a hunted hare, crouching or scuttling towards the figure of the Saint; (5) a greyhound in pursuit; (6) a dog.¹

Melangell properly became the patroness of hares, which were popularly called Wyn Melangell, her Lambs, and so strong a superstition used to prevail that no person would kill a hare in the parish; and it was even firmly believed that if any one cried, "Duw a Melangell a'th gadwo!" "God and Melangell preserve thee!" after a hunted hare, it would surely escape.²

Gwely Melangell, her hard Bed, is shown in the cleft of a rock called Craig y Gwely on the opposite side of the valley, about quarter of a mile to the south of the church.

Melangell's festival occurs as January 31 in Peniarth MSS. 186, 187, 219, Mostyn MS. 88, Additional MS. 14,882, the Iolo MSS., ¹ For a detailed and illustrated description of the church, the screen, and the shrine (restored), see Thomas, Hist. of Dio. of S. Asaph, ii (1910), pp. 260-5; Arch. Camb., 1848, pp. 137-42, 324-8; 1894, pp. 139-51; 1903, pp. 109-13; Montgomeryshire Collections, xii, pp. 53-80; J. C. Wall, Shrines of British Saints, 1905, pp. 48-9. The following is found written in the oldest parish register, and was probably once current in the parish—"Mil engyl a Melangell, Trechant lu fyddin y Fall" (a thousand angels and Melangell shall triumph over the whole host of the Devil). It is elsewhere given in a slightly different form, "Engyl a ffon Melangell, Trechant flin fyddin y Fall" (the angels and Melangell's staff shall triumph over the vexatious host of the Devil). She seems to be confounded with the Archangel.

² The parishioners of Pennant are nicknamed "Ysgyfarnogod" (hares). The sacred character of the hare among the Celts is indicated by the story of Boudica loosing one from her robe in order to observe its movements as an omen (Dion Cassius, lxii, c. 3; cf. Cæsar, v, c. 12). S. Brendan provided an asylum for hares, as well as stags and wild boars. Cf. also the incident of the chased hare in the Life of S. Anselm.

and Nicolas Roscarrock; as May 4 in Peniarth MS. 187, the Iolo MSS., the Prymer of 1633, Allwydd Paradwys, and Nicolas Roscarrock; and as May 27 in Peniarth MSS. 27 (pt. i), 172, 186, 187, 191, 192, 219, Jesus College MS. 141, Mostyn MS. 88, Llanstephan MSS. 117, 181, Additional MS. 14,882, the Iolo MSS., and the Prymers of 1546, 1618, and 1633. At Pennant Melangell her festival was observed on May 27. On January 31 she may have been confounded with S. Marcella, and on May 4 very probably with S. Monica.

S. MELERI, Matron

MELERI was, according to both versions of the Cognatio de Brychan a daughter of Brychan, who married Ceredig ab Cunedda Wledig and became the mother of Sant, the father of S. David. John of Tynemouth says that she was Brychan's second daughter.¹ In the later genealogies she is always called Eleri,² due to the rubricator not having filled in the initial letter of the name in the copy from which they emanated. Nothing more seems to be known about her.

S. MELLONIUS, Bishop, Confessor

MELLONIUS, Bishop of Rouen, is said to have been a native of Cardiff, and to have been born about the year 257. Unhappily, however, the material for his Life is of very poor quality. The Vita was written in the seventeenth century by Dom F. Pommeraye, O.S.B., from earlier material, but none very reliable, or very ancient. Acta SS. Boll., October 22, ix, 570-4.

Mellonius was selected to carry the British tribute to Rome, being at that time a pagan. On reaching the Eternal City he offered sacrifice to Mars. But making acquaintance with Pope Stephen I he was converted, and on his way home stopped at Rouen, having been greatly assisted on the road by a walking-stick kindly furnished him by an angel. At Rouen he preached to crowds. A youth named Præcordius climbed on to a roof the better to hear him, but tumbled down and was killed. Mellonius prostrated himself on the body and revived him. This incident is appropriated from the Acts of the Apostles. Mellonius became first bishop of Rouen, and governed the church there for fifty-one years, and died in 311.

¹ Nova Legenda, ed. Horstman, 1901, ii, p. 103. She is not so given in the Cognatio.

² Jesus College MS. 20; Peniarth MS. 75 (16th cent.); Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 425; Cambro-British Saints, p. 271; Iolo MSS., pp. 111, 120, 140. Mr. Egerton Phillimore points out that the names Meleri and Teleri (of Aber Tileri) are derived from Hilaria, with the common honorific or endearing prefixes mo and to.

The Life is stuffed with absurd stories of miracles of no interest to any one. As may be judged, it is practically worthless historically. All that we can predicate concerning Mellonius is that he was bishop of Rouen, and that possibly he came from Cardiff.

He is the patron of S. Mellon's, in Welsh Llaneirwg,¹ four and a half miles east of Cardiff. Probably the dedication was due to the Norman conquerors of Morganwg. In the Taxatio of 1254 the church is called "Eccl. Scti. Melani." In that of 1291, "Eccl'ie (sic) de S̄co Melano." In the Valor 1535,² "Eccl'ia P'o^{lis} Sancti Melani." Rees³ gives him from Cressy as Mello, Mallo, Melanius, or Melonius, a Briton.

Browne Willis⁴ gives his festival at S. Mellon's as October 10.

There is a farm called Pont Melon in the parish of Llandaff. A modern figure of him is in the east window of Roath Church, Cardiff.

S. Melon is the name of a parish in Léon. It is very questionable whether S. Mellion and S. Mullyon, in Cornwall, and the chapel of Lamellion, in Liskeard, be dedicated to S. Mellion of Rouen, and not to S. Melanius of Rennes. Melanius was a much more genuine personage than Mellion. He assisted at the Council of Orleans in 511, and died between the years 530 and 535. The introduction of his name into Cornwall was probably due to the settlement there by Athelstan of refugee Bretons from the inroads of the Northmen. They brought the bodies of their Saints with them.

S. MELOR, Martyr

THE authorities for S. Melor, and for his father S. Meliau, or Melyan, are these.

1. A Life, supposed to have been written before 849, but this is ¹ For a very fanciful explanation of this name—"derived from his swarthy complexion"—see Coxe, Monmouthshire, 1801, p. 61.

² iv, p. 363.

³ Welsh Saints, p. 316.

⁴ Llandaff, 1719, append., p. 8; Paroch. Angl., 1733, p. 205.

questionable, published in Analecta Bollandiana by Dom Plaine, v (1886), pp. 166-85.

2. A Life by John of Tynemouth in Capgrave's Nova Legenda Angliæ.

3. A short Life in MS. Reg. 8, C. vii, of the thirteenth century, published in Horstman's new edition of the Nova Legenda, Oxford, 1901, i, p. xxv.

4. A Life in Grandisson's Legendarium for the Church of Exeter, still in MS. in the Chapter Library, Exeter. This was drawn up in 1366.

Great difference of opinion has reigned relative to the date at which S. Melor lived. The Bollandists, who reprinted the Life from Capgrave, Acta SS., January 1, 136-7, supposed his date was 411; Lobineau put him as late as 798; but since the publication of his complete Acts by Dom Plaine, very little doubt can exist as to his period, which is fixed by the mention therein of Conmore, Regent of Domnonia, with whom he found refuge.

According to the pedigree of the princes of Cornouaille, in Armorica,¹ Ian-Reith, a noble Briton, migrated to that peninsula, and established himself in Cornu-Gallia. He was succeeded by his son Daniel, and Daniel by his son Budoc I. Budoc died, according to De la Borderie's reckoning, about 530. According to the Life of S. Melor he left two sons, Meliau and Rivold. But it seems that there must have been three, of whom one was named Budoc, who, however, did not immediately succeed his father, but had to fly for his life to South Wales, as there was a struggle between contending factions, and the Cartularies of Quimper and Landevenec give Grallo Flain and Concar Choevoc as princes between Budoc I and Budoc II.² Meliau, perhaps, had his residence at Plounevez-Porzay, near Quimper, during his father's life, as tradition asserts, and as the church there claims him as patron. But after the death of Budoc I he secured the chiefdom of Léon. The Life of S. Melor does not assert that Meliau succeeded his father in Cornouaille as King, but that he held the "ducatum" for seven years, during which time no rain fell, "in ipso regno," nor snow, but the land yielded her increase in abundance. But the author adds that Meliau held the rule "in regno post patrem" for these seven years. This, however, may mean no more than that under Budoc I Léon had been subject to him as well as Cornouaille. The documents available for the determination of the history of this period are so scanty that we are driven to conjecture. What makes the suggestion probable is the absence of the name of Meliau from the lists of the princes of Cornouaille, and the presence in Léon of traces of his presence there, as Guic-Miliau (Vicus Melovii), now Lampaul-Guimiliau, near the Elorn, and at Ploumiliau (Plebs Melovii), near Plestin, now included in Côtes du Nord, and an Ile de Miliau, off the coast, and Trébeurdin, of which he is patron.

¹ Dom Morice, Mémoires pour servir de preuves, etc., Paris, 1742; and Cart. of Quimper in Bulletin de la Commission diocésaine, ed. Peyron, Quimper, 1901; Cart. of Landevenec, ed. De la Borderie, Rennes, 1888.

² "Quidam nobilis apud transmarinos extitit, cui cognomen erat Lex vel Regula vir quidam genere regius, terra, familis, opibus admodum opulentus . . . Is post desolationem Frixonum et Corsoldi ducis, nostram adiens disertam Cornugalliam, (parata) classe, mare cum maximo apparatu transmisit, regnum accepit, habitavit, excoluit. Post ejus decessum Daniel filius ejus regnum tenuit; cui successit filius Budic; huic vero duo existere filii, Meliavus videlicet et Rivodius." Vita S. Melori, ed. Plaine, p. 166.

Flain, Ceroenoc - su p

His headquarters would seem to have been on the Elorn, where two important parishes bear his name.

Meliau took to himself a wife from Domnonia, named Aurilia, daughter of Judoc, whom the biographer apparently confounds with the Count of Domnonia who lived in 640, but who was a petty chief of the same name. Rivold, Meliau's brother, did not get a share of the father's principality, or if he did, desired more, and, in a colloquy with Meliau, treacherously stabbed him, and seized on his domain and rule. Meliau is accounted a martyr, and receives a cult on October 25. Meliau fell about 537, leaving an only son Melor (Melior). Rivold seized on the lad, and would have put him to death but for the intervention of some of the chiefs. He therefore contented himself with cutting off his right hand and left foot, so as to incapacitate him from becoming a pretender to the throne, as, according to Celtic usage, no one with a bodily defect was eligible.

The affection of the attendants for the young prince led them to get a silver hand and brazen foot fitted to the stumps, and, so says the legend, Divine power was manifested, in that the boy was able to employ these metal members as though they were flesh and bone. For precaution, the boy was sent to Quimper, and placed in the monastery founded by S. Corentine.

Now it fell out, one day, that Melor and other boys were nutting in a wood, and his comrades made their little piles of hazel nuts, and brought them to Melor, who received them into his silver hand. Moreover, when he returned home, to the amazement of the good folk in the street, they saw his silver hand passed through the grating of the door, as he cast away the nut-shells he had broken to get at the kernels.

One day he was playing with a toy catapult, and shot his bolt, which came down on a stone and penetrated it. When he withdrew the bolt a spring gushed forth, and the spring is shown to this day at Meilars, near Pont-Croix, in Finistère, west of Quimper. The tidings of these wonders having reached Rivold, he sent for Cerialtan, the foster-father of Melor, and promised him that if he would make away with the lad, he would give him as much land as he could see from the top of Mount Coc.¹

Cerialtan's greed was excited, and he confided the proposal to his wife. She was horror-struck, and resolved on saving the boy. Whilst her husband was absent, she fled with Melor to Domnonia, and took refuge with the regent Conmore, whose wife was a daughter of Budoc I, and therefore aunt to Melor. They found shelter in the Castellum Bocciduum, which De la Borderie conjectures to have been Beuzit, west of Lanmeur, where considerable remains of a caer may still be seen. Rivold was incensed, but he did not dare to complain to the powerful and masterful regent. He therefore urged Cerialtan to use guile, entice the boy away, and cut off his head.

Cerialtan, accordingly, went to Beuzit, and took with him his son Justan, who had been a play-fellow of Melor, and to whom he was attached. The treacherous foster-father persuaded the prince of his good intentions. Melor and Justan were placed to sleep in one bed. During the night Cerialtan stole into the room, and murdered the prince as he slept. Then, rousing Justan, he fled with him; but as they were leaving the castle, by climbing over the wall, Justan's foot caught, and he fell and was killed. Cerialtan, however, pushed on till he reached a place called Kerlean, near Carhaix, when exhausted and parched with thirst, he halted, and putting down the head of Melor, which he carried off with him, he exclaimed, "Confounded be I! I have lost my son, and now am myself perishing for water." Thereupon the dead head spoke; "Cerialtan, drive thy staff into the soil, and water will spring up." Much astonished, the murderer complied; whereupon a spring boiled up; more than that, the staff took root, threw out branches, and in time became a great tree. On reaching the residence of Rivold, Cerialtan delivered up the head, and demanded the price of his crime. The prince thereupon put out the eyes of the murderer, led him to the top of Mount Coc, and bade him take as much land as he could see.

Such is the legend in its complete form.

That in the Legendarium of Bishop Grandisson confounds Cornouaille with Cornwall and Armorican Domnonia with Devon. "Sanctus Melorus, Melani Cornubiæ regis filius, cum esset septem annorum, ¹ Or Seoc. This cannot have been the Menez Hom, as has been supposed, as that was out of Conmore's district.

orbatus est patre. Genetrix autem illius erat de Devonia regione, Haurilla nomine, ex Rivoldi comitis stemmate, qui a transmarinis partibus quondam advenerat." John of Tynemouth says: "Fuit enim beatus Melorus de nobili Britannorum genere, cujus pater Melianus ducatum Cornubiæ tenuit . . . Rivoldus veniens, Melianum fratrem suum occidit, et pro illo regno cepit," and does not mention the name of Melor's mother.

The legend is mixed up with fable, but contains a basis of historic fact. The Melor of Brittany has acquired the silver hand of Nuada, King of the Tuatha Dé Danann of Irish Mythology.

What is probably fact is that Rivold mutilated his nephew, and that the amputated members were replaced by some rude make-shifts, which he was able to employ after a fashion, and that eventually he was murdered.

The date of his death was about 544, when he was aged fourteen.

Conmore, we may be quite sure, used the occasion to extend his authority over Léon, which thenceforth was incorporated in Domnonia, and ceased to be attached to Cornouaille, and it was in Léon, at Plounéour-Nevez, that the battle was fought in 555 in which he lost his life, and Judual became king over both Domnonia and Léon. Popular tradition has improved the legend. In Brittany it attaches to every stage of the flight of Melor from his uncle. His estates are said to have been at Lanmeur, between Lannion and Morlaix, in Domnonia. Between Carhaix and Lanmeur, according to the legend, when he was pursued, the earth sank and formed a hollow, in which he concealed himself. This is still shown, and called Guele San Velar, or the Bed of S. Melor. A chapel was built over the spot. Thence he pushed on in the direction of Boiséon, but was overtaken by night and took refuge at a farm in Plouigneau, now called Gouer Velar, or the Rivulet of Melor. On leaving the farm next morning, without his breakfast, he ascended a hill and fainted from exhaustion, where now stands a small chapel dedicated to him at Coat-sao-bell (the Wood of the Long Ascent). Thence he pushed on to Boiséon. Thither Cerialtan came and carried him off to Lanmeur, where he stabbed him at a spot near the parish church, which is pointed out as the scene of the murder. Indeed, even a room in the old wooden house is called Cambr-ar-Sant, or the Chamber of the Saint. Tradition is so minute in its particulars relative to the localities, that it is difficult to doubt that S. Melor belongs to Brittany and not to Cornwall.

In the Church of Lanmeur in Finistère is a crypt, very early, with rude carvings, probably of the tenth century, perhaps even earlier, in which it is supposed that the martyred prince was buried. In this crypt is his Holy Well.

The only grounds for associating his father Meliau or Melyan with Cornwall are the statements in Grandisson's Legendarium, and in John of Tynemouth. As also, that in the parish of Par is a Lanmelin, and hard by a Merthyr. S. Mellion can not be regarded as dedicated to the father of Melor, almost certainly S. Melanius of Rennes is patron. Melor is venerated at Mylor, in Cornwall, where tradition says he was murdered. The Feast Day there is on October 25, which is the day of Meliau or Melyan, the father. Linkinhorne is also dedicated to him. Here also is a Holy Well in admirable preservation, but Mylor is more probably S. Maglorious.

Mylor Church is interesting on account of its Norman doorway and very early crosses, one of which is traditionally held to mark the site of S. Melor's grave.¹

The document known as the Translatio S. Maglorii informs us that, on account of the ravages of the Northmen, the body of S. Melor was translated from Lanmeur, between 875 and 878, to Lehon; but between 910 and 913 the relics were carried thence, probably when Mathuedoi and a large number of Bretons fled to the protection of Edward the Elder and Athelstan, and the body of S. Melor was taken to Amesbury, in Wiltshire. The abbey church of Amesbury is dedicated to SS. Mary and Melor.

The Feast of S. Melor in Bishop Grandisson's Calendar is October 1. This is also the day in the Sarum Breviary, and in a Norwich Martyrology of the fifteenth century.

Cressy in his Church History of Brittany, Rouen, 1668, gives as his day August 28, which was the day of the Feast at Mylor, till changed to October 25. In the Quimper Breviary of 1642, 1701, 1835, he is entered on October 2. This also is the day given by Albert le Grand and by Lobineau. On October 1, however, in the S. Malo Breviary of 1537, and Missal of 1609.

Wilson, in his English Martyrology, arbitrarily inserted him on January 3, but with an asterisk to indicate that he had no authority for the day, and he has been followed by the Bollandists.

In Brittany he is patron of Lanmeur, Loc-Melar, Meilars, in Finistère, and of Tremelior, in Côtes du Nord, near Châtelaudren and of S. Meloir des Ondes in Ille et Vilaine; also of numerous chapels.

In the crypt of Lanmeur is his statuette, of the fourteenth century, representing him in a long robe, covered with a royal mantle, wearing a crown, and holding in his right hand the left which has been cut off. In Loc-Melar, he is represented crowned, with alb, dalmatic, and a royal mantle, holding an amputated hand in his right, and a palm branch in his left. The statue is of the seventeenth century. Here also are some bas-reliefs, painted, representing his legend. Perhaps a better symbol would be a bunch of hazel-nuts held in his silver right hand.

¹ Mylor Church, by W. Jago, in Journal of the R. Institution of Cornwall. iii (1868-79), p. 164.

We append the Life from Bishop Grandisson's Legendarium, ii, fo. 154 (1366), as it has been hitherto unpublished.

[1st October.] { In translacione Sanctorum confessorum renigii et vedasti pontificum et bavonis pontificis [nine lessons].

Sanctus melorus, meliani cornubie regis filius : cum esset septem annorum orbatus est patre. Genitrix autem illius erat de devonia regione, haurilla nomine ex rivoldi comitis stemmate : qui a transmarinis partibus quondam advenerat. Hunc itaque melorum scelestissimus pervasor regni fratricidaque nephandissimus rivoldus comprehensum : deduxit inter primates in cornubie concilium redempnandum. Erant quippe in eorum conventu episcoporum nonnulli : innumerabiles vero clerici ac ephebatorum cohortes. Moliente itaque rivoldo nepotem suum melorum perimere : non permiserunt proceres terre. Nec eum tamen revertere poterant ad sinum pietatis.

Tunc proehdolor absceditur sancto meloro manus dextera : pes eciam levus cesus est ab ipso maligno patruo suo. Insitaque est sancto meloro manus argentea : pes eciam eneus : pro carneis. O quam insolitum et dampnosum omnimodis est tale commercium : pro manus vel pedis carne commutare est sive argentum. Manet tamen omnibus mirabile nulli sanctorum conferendum : quod peritissimorum narratione virorum compertum est. Adeo siquidem manus sancti melori argentea crescebat et pes eneus : quemadmodum solent in reliquis pueris naturalia carnis excrescere membra. Nutritus est sane in cenobio sancti corentini : donec corpore adultus bonisque actibus ornatus mira patraret opera per reliquas iam notus provincias.

Cumque de meloro tam sancta fama per vicinas quasque divulgaretur provincias et ad malivolum rivoldum patruum eius divertisset : invidere cepit suo nepoti et dolo diem mortis eius moliri. Dum vero intra se diucius volveret quomodo hoc nephas perageret : nutu stimulatus diaboli invitavit beatissimi nutritorem melori ut secum pranderet. Quod ipse facere : nequaquam distulit. Interea : illis prandentibus de sancto meloro cepit habere colloquium dicens. Si perimeris clientem tuum melorum faciam te auri argentineque ditissimum. Hec autem dicebat quia si voluisset eum palam interimere metuebat ne sui eum milites eruerent. Ideoque : clam volebat eum interfici. Quod audiens uxor nutricii : puerum secreta ad amitam suam misit. Hoc intelligens nutricius illuc proficissitur : et quasi alumpnum suum visitaturus hospicium secum suscepit. Utrosque ergo : recepit lectus unus. Set cum dormisset puer : ille surrexit et decollavit eum.

S. MELYD, Archbishop, Confessor

MELYD cannot properly be regarded as a Welsh Saint, but he is included as such in one of the late documents printed in the Iolo MSS.,¹ where it is stated that he was son of Cynfelydd, of the family of Brân Fendigaid, and that his church is in London, where he was bishop. Elsewhere in the genealogies of the Welsh Saints he is simply entered as "bishop of London, a man from the country of Rome."¹

¹ P. 136.

By him is intended Mellitus, an abbot of Rome, who was sent, with Justus, and others, by Gregory to England in 601 to assist S. Augustine in his mission, by whom he was consecrated first bishop of London in 604. In 619 he became archbishop of Canterbury, and died in 624.

The only church in Wales that is claimed to be dedicated to Melyd is that of Meliden, in Flintshire, a name which stands, apparently, for Melid-ton, but it is generally called in Welsh Gallt Melyd,² Melyd's Slope. Edward Lhuyd, in 1699, entered under the parish, "Ffynnon Velid in Gallt felid township."

Melyd's festival is given in the Welsh MS. additions to the Calendar in a copy of the Preces Privatae, 1573, in S. Beuno's (Jesuit) College Library, as May 9. So Edward Lhuyd, and Bishop Maddox in Book Z, in the Episcopal Library, S. Asaph. The festival of Melydyn is entered in the Calendar in Llanstephan MS. 117 on the same day. The festival of Mellitus, however, is on April 24.

S. MENEFRIDA or MINVER, Virgin, Abbess

MENEFRIDA is the Latin form of the name. She is reckoned by Leland and William of Worcester among the daughters of Brychan who settled in north-east Cornwall. She was, however, his granddaughter, if she be equated with Mwynen, daughter of Brynach, by Corth, daughter of Brychan.³ As shall be shown under S. MERRYN, there is reason for holding the latter to be the same Saint as Minver; and also probably the same as the Irish Monynna. See further under S. MORWENNA. According to the Bodmin Antiphonary, S. Menefrida's Day was November 24.

Nicolas Roscarrock says of her that the present church is distant half a mile from where she was wont to live, "and at this daye is called Tredresick, where in my time I remember there stode a chapell also dedicated to her, by less than two miles from the place where her sister S. Endelient lived ; and there is also a well of her name, where it is said the Ghostlye Adversarie coming to molest her, she was combing her head by the said well, she flinging the combe at him enforced him to flye, who left a note behinde him in a place called at this daye Topalundy, where on the topp of a rounde high hill, there is a straunge deepe Hoale (as men there have by Tradition) there made by the devile in avoyding S. Menfre." He gives November 23 instead of 24th, as her day. She was not sister, but niece of S. Endelienta.

¹ Llanstephan MS. 81, p. 3; Cardiff MS. 5 (1527), p. 119; Cambro-British Saints, p. 270.

² In the Taxatio of 1291, pp. 287-8, it is Allt Meliden (or Melydyn).

³ ii, pp. 218-9, 256-7. The ver in the name stands for verch, virgin.

Her well is near the Church of S. Minver, near Padstow, and the water from it is always used for baptisms.

The hole Topalundy is probably Lundy Hole near the sea. It is an old cave, the top of which has fallen in.

Mynwer, or Minwear, is the name of a parish in Pembrokeshire, now subject to Slebech ; and lower down, in the parish of S. Florence, is a place called Minerton. It is just possible that we have here the name Minver, and that Minwear Church, which has now no dedication, was dedicated to this Saint.¹

S. MERCHGUINUS, Confessor

MERCHGUINUS was a disciple of S. Dubricius, who is named in his Life² as among the many "learned men and doctors who flocked to him for study." He is probably the Merchguinus, or Merchui, mentioned in the Life of S. Oudoceus³ as prominent among the clergy and others who chose that Saint to be bishop of Llandaff in succession to Teilo, and went with him to his consecration at Canterbury.

A king Merchguinus, the son of Gliuis, and a clerical witness of the same name, occur in a grant to the Church of Llandaff.⁴ They were contemporary with Dubricius.

S. MERIN, Confessor

MERIN was the son of Seithenin Frenhin, of Maes Gwyddno, whose territory was submerged by the sea, and now lies under Cardigan

¹ Owen, Pembrokeshire, ii, p. 348.

² Book of Llan Dáv, p. 80.

³ Ibid., pp. 131-2.

⁴ Ibid., p. 76.

Bay. He was brother to SS. Tudclyd, Gwynhoedl, Tudno, and Senewyr.¹ The bonedd in Peniarth MS. 45 gives his name as Meirin, and the later documents² as Meiryn, Merini, and Myrini. He and his brothers are in the latter stated to have become, on losing their possessions, Saints or monks of Bangor-on-Dee.

Merin is patron of the little parish of Bodferin, in Carnarvonshire, near which is the foundation of his brother, Gwynhoedl. His festival, which does not occur in any of the Calendars, was observed here on January 6.³ The parish is a very small one. It runs for about a mile along the coast, and is a little more in breadth, with a population in 1901 of 49 souls. Only the foundations of its old parish church, which was subject to Llaniestyn, now remain. In 1900 was consecrated the new church of S. Merin, at a distance of over a mile, within the parish of Aberdaron. The newly constituted parish includes Bodferin, and parts of Aberdaron and Bryncroes. There is a small creek in the parish called Porth Ferin, and the brook Rhyd Merin forms part of the parish boundary.⁴

It is stated in one of the late documents in the *Iolo MSS.*⁵ that Meiryn ab Myrini ab Saethenin had a church dedicated to him in Gwaen Lllwg (Gwynllywg). Meiryn, between Newport and Cardiff, is intended, which is called in the *Book of Llan Dâu*⁶ Maerun, and in English Marshfield; but it would be impossible to equate the names Meiryn and Merin. Llanvetherin, or Llanverin, in Monmouthshire, is commonly supposed to be dedicated to him. Its correct dedication, however, is S. Gwytherin.

A S. Merin is culted in Brittany at Lanmerin, in the diocese of Tréguier, where the Pardon is on the 3rd Sunday after Easter. Kerviler gives as his day April 4, as does also Gautier du Mottai, but without stating their authority. A statue of him at Lanmerin, of the sixteenth century, represents him in rochet and cope, his head bare, and a book in his hands. No record exists as to who he was.

A sixth century bishop, S. Merinus, is known to Scotland, with festival on September 15. The church of Paisley was formerly dedi-

¹ Peniarth MSS. 16, 45; Hafod MS. 16. Merin is the Latin name Marinus borrowed. It was borne by several persons at an early period, and is the name to-day of at least two streams (besides that at Bodferin), one a tributary of the Mynach, near Aberystwyth, and the other of the Dovey, near Machynlleth.

² Myv. Arch., pp. 419, 428; Iolo MSS., pp. 105-6, 141-2. In Cardiff MS. 25, p. 35, it is spelt Merfyn.

³ Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 275; Cambrian Register, iii (1818), p. 224.

⁴ Hanes Eglwysi a Phlwyfi Lleyn, ed. Davies, Pwllheli, 1910, pp. 174-7. For the legend respecting the foundation of the old church, see Myrddin Fardd, Llên Gwerin Sir Gaernarfon, 1909, pp. 207-8.

⁵ P. 106.

⁶ Index, p. 411.

cated to him and SS. Milburga and James. His Acts are in the Breviary of Aberdeen.¹

S. MERNOG, Bishop, Confessor

In a list of church founders in Glamorgan, given in the Iolo MSS.,² is entered, "Llanfernog, S. Mernog, of Côr Dochwy," i.e. Llandough, near Cardiff. Mernog's name does not occur in any of the Welsh saintly pedigrees, but by him is no doubt meant Mernoc, or Marnoc, son of Barurchus, who is mentioned in the Life of S. Brendan,³ and is identified in the Irish Calendars with S. Ernan. Mernoc is commemorated on October 25 at Kilmarnock, in Scotland, where he had a cell, and where he died. The Aberdeen Breviary gives a collect for him.

Llanfernog is in all probability intended for the original form of Lavernock, subject to Penarth, the church of which is dedicated to S. Lawrence. Its real Welsh form is, however, Llywernog,⁴ which does not appear to embody Mernog's name.

S. MERRYN, Virgin, Abbess

In the Episcopal Registers, Bronescombe, 1259, 1274; Grandisson, 1332, 1338, 1349, 1351, 1362; Stafford, 1395, 1396, etc., the church bearing the name of this Saint in Cornwall is called that of Sta. Marina. A Saint so called was a Bithynian damsel who went into a monastery of men, dressed in male clothes. She is given two commemorations in the Roman Martyrology, on June 18, and December 4. The Feast at S. Merryn is on July 7, or the Sunday nearest, and this agrees with neither of the days of commemoration of S. Marina. It does, however, approximate to that of S. Morwenna, which is July 6. Merryn is, apparently, a corruption of Morwen, and Nicolas Roscarrock says, "I have heard S. Morwenna spoken of as S. Merina of S. Merrin."

See on under S. MONYNNA.

S. MEUBRED, or MYBARD, Hermit, Martyr

ACCORDING to William of Worcester, Mybard was son of a King of Ireland, and was also called Colrog. He settled at Cardinham

¹ Forbes, Kalendars of Scottish Saints, Edinb., 1872, pp. 397-8.

² P. 221.

³ Cambro-British Saints, pp. 251, 253.

⁴ Myv. Arch., p. 748.

near Bodmin, in Cornwall, as a hermit, where he was murdered. His companions were Mannach, or Mancus, and Wyllow.

Morbred was the name of a Saint, a contemporary of S. Winwaloe, of Landevennec; and the name occurs in the Cartulary of Landevennec, but in one of the forged deeds. "Haec descriptio declarat quod Sanctus Morbretus habuit colloquium apud sanctum Uingualoem, cui et seipsum et beneficium, quod eidem sancto Morbreto dedit Euenus comes qui dictus est Magnus, et omnia quae habuit, perpetualiter, ut illum apud Deum haberet intercessorem, commendavit." ¹

This is dated March 31, 955. Either Morbred lived in the tenth century, and his commendation of his land was made, not to S. Winwaloe personally, but to his monastery, or else there is a gross anachronism. The settlement of S. Morbred made over to Landevennec was Lanrivoaré, south of Ploudalmezeau, in Finistère.

In the diocese of Quimper, at Ploumodiern, is a hamlet with a chapel called Loc-Mybrit, and he is said by tradition to have for a while led there an eremitical life.

If Morbred or Mybrit were a contemporary of S. Winwaloe, he might possibly enough, after resigning his settlement at Lanrivoaré, have gone to Cornwall, and there died. But this is not likely if he lived in the tenth century.

Meubred is represented in one of the windows of S. Neot, carrying one head, and wearing a yellow cap on the head, which is on his shoulder. The inscription is, "Sancte Mabarde ora pro nobis." His Feast at Cardinham is on the Thursday before Pentecost.

The name Meuprit (in the Irish, Mepric) occurs in Nennius in the genealogy of Fernmail, King of Gworthigirniaun; and is also found on the Phillack stone in Cornwall, "Clotuali Fili Mobratti," unless the last word be read "Mogratti."

S. MEUGAN, Confessor

MEUGANT, Meugan, or Meigan, was the son of Gwyndaf Hên ab Emyr Llydaw, by Gwenonwy, daughter of Meurig ab Tewdrig, king of Morganwg. He was brother to S. Henwyn, or Hywyn. He does not appear to be included in any pedigrees but those in the Iolo MSS. These state ² that he was a Saint or monk of Côt Illtyd, at Llantwit, and afterwards of Côt Dyfrig, at Caerleon-on-Usk. In his old age

¹ Cart. Landevennec, Rennes, 1888, p. 163.

² Iolo MSS., p. 132. In Old-Welsh his name would have been Moucant. Maucant, son of Pascent, occurs in the genealogies in Harleian MS. 3859 c.

S. MYBARD.

From Stained Glass, S. Neot.

W. Neot

he retired to Bardsey, where he lies buried. He thus followed closely in his father's steps. The latter was his superior at Caerleon. It is further said of him¹ that he had a college, Côr Meugant, on the banks of the Wye, which was one of a number of Côrau, containing in all 2,000 Saints, that Dyfrig presided over as penrhaith or principal. The authorities for these statements, it must be remembered, are late.

We know very little of Meugan; but he must have had a somewhat extensive cult in Wales, judging by the impress his name has left on the topography.

In Anglesey, the now extinct Capel Meugan stood in a field near Plâs Meugan, in the parish of Llandegfan. The chapel gradually fell to decay after the founding of the Chantry of our Lady of Beau-maris. Here his festival was observed on September 25.² Gorsedd Meugan, Dinas Meugan, as well as Plâs Meugan (modern) are in the parish.

In Denbighshire there is dedicated to him the quaint little church of Llanrhydd (the Red Church), now under Ruthin, but originally its mother church.³

Llanigan, in Breconshire, is under his invocation. In the Taxatio of 1291 it is called "Eccl'ia de S'c'o Mengano."

It is in Pembrokeshire, however, that he has left most traces, especially in the Deanery of Kemes, in the north-east. He had formerly a chapel in the parish of Llanfair Nant Gwyn, known as S. Meugan's in Kemes. It was pulled down in 1592 by order of the Privy Council, because of the "superstitious pilgrimages" to his shrine.⁴ There was once a Capel Meugan in the parish of Bridell, in the same Deanery, which is mentioned as a pilgrimage chapel, being used for solemn processions on holy days.⁵ There are places called Trevigan, in Llanrian, 1100). It is not improbable that the name is the same as that of the Cornish S. Mawgan. It is the Maucannus of the Life of S. David. Cf. also Lo-Mogan in Sainte-Sève, Côtes-de-Nord.

¹ P. 151.

² Richard Llwyd, Poetical Works, London, 1837, pp. 24-5, note, where he is also referred to in verse as "the lonely Hermit"; cf. the "Miganus heremita," under Llandegfan, in Leland, Collect., 1774, iv, p. 89.

³ Pant Meugan, divided into Pant Meugan Ucha and Isa, occurs in the Ruthin Castle Papers as the name, in the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries, of a tract of land lying in the adjoining parish of Llanfwrog. It is mentioned also in two Peniarth MSS. (Report, i, pp. 845, 973). Tir Meugan, at Bathafarn, is mentioned as boundary land in an account of the perambulation, in 1810, of the adjoining parish of Llanfair (Llanfair Papers). For an account of the Llanrhydd Wakes, on September 25, see Edw. Pugh, Cambria Depicta, London, 1816, pp. 437-9. Bodeugan, one of the townships of S. Asaph parish, probably stands for Bod Feugan; for the elision of the F cf. Bodeilir, Bodeurig, Bodorgan, Boduan, etc.

⁴ Dr. Henry Owen in Pembrokeshire Antiquities, Solva, 1897, p. 54.

⁵ Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, p. 509.

and Llanfogygan and Pistyll Moygan, near Pant y Deri, in the same county. A great fair, called Ffair Feugan, was held at Eglwys Wrw on the Monday after Martinmas, O.S., and is still held on the Monday after November 22. Another Ffair Feugan was held at S. Dogmael's; both in the Deanery of Kemes.¹

His father has also a dedication in the same county at Llanwnda, as well as another in Carnarvonshire.

S. Maughan's, in Monmouthshire, which is called Lann Mocha, and Ecclesia de S. Machuto in the Book of Llan Dâv, is dedicated to S. Malo, and not to S. Meugan, as is sometimes stated. There is a Kilvigan, or Cilfygan, west of the town of Usk, which probably perpetuates the name.

There are several Meugan festivals in the Welsh Calendars. February 14 (festival of Manchan, abbot of Mohill, co. Leitrim), in that in Mostyn MS. 88; April 24 in Llanstephan MS. 117; September 25 in Peniarth MSS. 27 (pt. 1), 172, 186, 187, and 219, Mostyn MS. 88, Llanstephan MS. 181, the Iolo MSS., Allwydd Paradwys, and the Prymers of 1546, 1618, and 1633; September 26 in Jesus College MS. 141, and Additional MS. 14,882; November 15 in the Demetian Calendar (as Bishop and Confessor); and November 18 in Llanstephan MS. 181, with the words added, "ffair gapel feygan." Browne Willis² gives the festival at Llandegfan and Llanrhydd as September 25. It is worthy of note that S. Mwrog, whose festival falls on the previous day, is patron of Llanfwrog, adjoining Ruthin and Llanrhydd, and also of another parish of the name in Anglesey.

There is in the twelfth century *Black Book of Carmarthen*³ a poem that is sometimes attributed to Meugant, who has been supposed to be the Saint, but on what authority it does not appear. It is almost entirely composed of unconnected rhyming adages, most of which may be found in collections of Welsh proverbs. The conclusion of the poem is wanting. Two other poems are attributed to Meugant in the Myvyrian Archaiology.⁴ The first is an elegy on Cynddylan, which Stephens believed "has the marks of genuineness," but the other he regarded as "not older than the Norman Conquest."⁵

One of the "Sayings of the Wise" triplets runs:—⁶

¹ Owen's Pembrokeshire, i, pp. 100, 143.

² Bangor, 1721, pp. 278, 281; but September 23, no doubt by mistake, at Llanfigan, Breconshire, Paroch. Angl., 1733, p. 182.

³ Ed. Evans, 1906, pp. 7-8.

⁴ Pp. 121-3. The latter part of the second poem is given again on p. 134.

⁵ Literature of the Kymry, 1876, pp. 283-5.

⁶ Iolo MSS., p. 252. The triplet occurs also among the "Stanzas of the Hearing" in Myv. Arch., p. 128, but with the addition of Pob before Enwir.

Hast thou heard the saying of Meugant
 At parting from his enemy :
 "The children of the wicked are evil spoken of."
 (Enwir difenwir ei blant).

Geoffrey of Monmouth says ¹ that a certain Meugant (Mauganius) was made bishop of Caer Fuddai, or Silchester, in Hampshire, by King Arthur, but assuming that he is not apocryphal, it is very improbable that he is the same person as Meugant ab Gwyndaf. Geoffrey also introduces a Meugant Ddewin, "the Magician" (Maugantius), into the legendary history of Vortigern as having been consulted by the king respecting the birth of Myrddin.²

Meugan may have been the holy man Moucan, or Maucan, mentioned in the Life of S. Cadoc ³ as intervening to obtain a reconciliation between that Saint and Maelgwn.

S. MEUGANT HÊN

MEUGANT (or Meigent) Hên, or "the Elder," is said to have been son of Cyndaf Sant, "a man of Israel," meaning probably a converted Jew.⁴ Cyndaf is stated to have accompanied the mythical Brân Fendigaid to Britain in the first century. Meugant's existence is equally questionable with his father's.⁵

S. MEURIG, King, Confessor

MEURIG AB TEWDRIG AB TEITHFALL, King of Morganwg, has been numbered among the Saints as a great benefactor to the Church.

Almost all that we know of him is from the Book of Llan Dâu, in which his name occurs repeatedly as making grants to S. Teilo and to the church of Llandaff.

His father, Tewdrig, resigned the rule into the hands of his son

¹ Red Book Bruts, ed. Rhys and Evans, p. 204; Hist. Brit., ix, c. 15. Leland, Itin., iv, p. 144, mentions "sedes S. Maugani."

² Ibid., pp. 142-3; vi. c. 18. Lewis Glyn Cothi (Works, p. 143) refers to him:—

"Mal Meigant pan gânt â'i gyrn Araith dda i Wrthëyrn."

³ Cambro-British Saints, pp. 94-6.

⁴ Iolo MSS, p. 102; Myv. Arch., p. 427. For another Saint of the same name see S. MEIGAN; and for "Meugant Hên, of Caerleon-on-Usk," one of the "Baptismal Bards of the Isle of Britain," see Iolo MSS, p. 79.

⁵ ii, pp. 229-30.

and retired to lead a hermit's life at Tintern, where he fell fighting against the Saxons. Meurig had his body conveyed to Mathern, buried there, and made a grant of the land about the Martyrium to S. Oudoceus.¹

He founded Llandaff not, as is pretended, as a monastery for S. Dubricius, but for Teilo. And the manner in which he dedicated it is described. He carried the Gospels on his back, and, with the clerks going before carrying crosses, he paced round the territory thus made over to the Church. The twelfth century compiler of the Book of Llan Dâv pretends, and no doubt believed, that he thus made the circuit of the whole diocese of Llandaff.²

He was married to Onbraust, daughter of Gurcant Mawr,³ king of Erging, and had by her four sons, Athruis, Idnerth, Frioc and Comereg, and daughters, Anna, married to Amwn Ddu, Afrella, married to Umbrafel, and Gwenonwy, married to Gwyndaf Hên.

In his old age all the portion of the kingdom west of the Towy was wrenched from him, and formed into a separate kingdom.⁴

The incursions of the Hwiccas into Ewyas and Erging had devastated it, and desolated the monasteries of Dubricius. The compiler of the Book of Llan Dâv pretends that he thereupon gave these sites to the Church of Llandaff, but it may be doubted whether this grant was made by him or by his son. The probable date of this inroad was 577, and Meurig can hardly have lived to so late a period. He must have died some thirty or more years before. He made a grant of Llancillo, in Herefordshire, to Bishop Ufelwy,⁵ which was afterwards swept into the possession of the Church of Llandaff. Meurig was buried at Llandaff.⁶

He was not what can be considered a saintly character, for after having solemnly sworn with one Cynvetu over the relics of the saints to keep peace together, Meurig treacherously slew Cynvetu. Thereupon Oudoceus summoned the great abbots of Llancarfan, Llantwit, and Llandough, and excommunicated the king, and at the same time placed an interdict on the land. This last statement is certainly false. They also solemnly cursed the king. "May his days be few, and let his children be orphans, and his wife a widow."

The king remained excommunicate for two years and more, and then bought his absolution by making over to Llandaff four vills. At this time he was an old man, for among the witnesses is his grandson Morgan.⁷

¹ Book of Llan Dâv, pp. 141-2. Meurig is the Latin name Mauricius. It also occurs as a brook name.

² Ibid., p. 71.

³ Ibid., pp. 132, 140.

⁴ Ibid., p. 133.

⁵ Ibid., p. 160.

⁶ Ibid., p. 149.

⁷ Ibid., p. 147.

In one document in the *Iolo MSS.*¹ he is said to have been killed by the Goidels in Ceredigion, where, it is added, a church was dedicated to him, by which is probably intended that of Ystrad Meurig; but the two statements are manifestly not true. In another document he is given as the founder of Llanfair Misgyn, in Glamorgan.²

A memorandum further states³: "Meurig, King of Glamorgan, gave, at his baptism, lands to God and to S. Teilo, and to the bishops of Llandaff for ever, namely, territorial lands and privileges. And from this it became customary to give lands to God and the Saints upon baptism."

One other document in the Iolo MSS. gives another Meurig as a Welsh Saint in the following two passages:—⁴

"Meurig, King of Dyfed, the son of Gwrthelin ab Eudaf ab Plaws Hên, King of Dyfed, the son of Gwrtherin, a prince of Rome, who expelled the Goidels from Dyfed and Gower."

"Meurig, King of Dyfed, was one of the four Kings who bore the Golden Sword before the Emperor Arthur, on the Three Principal Festivals, and on every festival and feast of rejoicing and dignity."

He is apocryphal as a Saint, but Cynyr of Caer Gawch, S. David's grandfather, is also traced up to the same "prince of Rome."

There is a place called Llanfeirig in the parish of Ceirchiog (annexed to Llechlched), in Anglesey.

S. MEUTHI, Abbot, Confessor

IN the Harley Charter 75. A. 19, of the time of Bishop Henry of Llandaff, 1193-1218, is notified the confirmation of certain lands at Llanfeithin to Margam Abbey, and it is stated that one acre was "to help in building the chapel to the honour of S. Meuthin" there.⁵

Llanfeithin, otherwise Llanfeithin and Llanoethin, is an extra-parochial district (of 433 acres) within the parish of Llancarfan, Glamorganshire, deriving its name from S. Meuthi or Meuthin. It is situated close to Cadoc's monastery, and he is the Meuthi of the Life of that Saint, who was baptised by him. He was "a religious Irishman

¹ P. 136. ² Ibid., p. 221.

P. 153. On p. 10 it is stated that he gave lands also to Llantwit; and on p. 139 that he was father of Pawl, or Paulinus, of Ty Gwyn.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 141-2.

⁵ De Gray Birch, Penrice and Margam Abbey MSS., 1893, i, p. 14; Margam Abbey, 1897, pp. 127-8, 393; Clark, Cartæ, i, pp. 44, 49-50.

who was a hermit, and devoutly served God." When Cadoc was seven years of age he was placed with Meuthi to be instructed, and remained with him twelve years.¹

In the Life of S. Tathan that Saint is made to perform Meuthi's part. The two names represent, in fact, but one person, Meuthi being the "pet" form. See further under S. TATHAN.

S. MEVEN, Abbot, Confessor

THE Life of S. Mewan, Mevan, or Meven has been published in the Analecta Bollandiana, iii (1884), pp. 142-80, by Dom Plaine, O.S.B.

This was composed, not by a writer of the period of Charles Martel (720-50), as supposed by Dom Plaine, but much later. M. Lot concludes not earlier than the end of the ninth century.² Mgr. Duchesne considers this Life as of the eleventh century³.

There is, as well, a portion of a Life in the Dol Breviary of 1519, published by the Abbé F. Duine, in Saints de Brocéliande, I. Saint Méen, Rennes, 1904, that appeared in the Annales de Bretagne, January, 1904.

Albert le Grand, in his Vies des SS. de Bretagne, gave a Life of S. Meven, and the Bollandists, not having an original text, translated the Life by Albert le Grand into Latin and published it in the Acta SS., Jun. IV, pp. 101-4. Albert le Grand derived his Life from the Breviaries of Léon and S. Malo, and the Proprium Sanctorum of the Diocese of Rennes.

Meven, also called Conaid, was born in Gwent. His father, Gerascen or Geraint, was of Erging,⁴ or Archenfield, and of the race of Cadell Deyrnllwg.⁵

The mother of Meven was, apparently, a sister of S. Samson. This is not stated in the Life, but Meven is said to have been a kinsman of Samson (propinquus non solam genere sed etiam vicinio). Samson's sister is described in no complimentary terms in the Life of this latter

¹ Cambro-British Saints, pp. 25-8.

² Annales de Bretagne, x, p. 75, note 1. According to M. Lot the name comes from maw, a servant.

³ Les anciens catalog. épisc. de la province de Tours, Paris, 1890, p. 94, note 2.

⁴ The biographer calls it "Orcheus pagus in Guentia provincia." He probably wrote Orchen for Erging, but a copyist altered it. The text is in a MS. of the sixteenth century.

⁵ iii, p. 50.

Oscheus

Can be described with the Count of Tolon Mearnion.

S. Meven

485

Saint, as one given up to the world and its pleasures.¹ This means no more than that she was indisposed to embrace the religious profession.

When Samson left Wales for Armorica, Meven probably accompanied him, taking with him his friend Austell, and both tarried with Samson in Cornwall. Our grounds for supposing this is that there are churches bearing the dedication of Meven at S. Mewan and Mevagissey, at no great distance from S. Samson's foundation at Golant, and Austell founded one that still bears his name. Meven had also a place of solitary retreat where stands still his Holy Well and Chapel, at Menacuddle, i.e., the cuddigl (cell or retreat) of Meven, in a picturesque glen, by the side of a stream near S. Austell.

When, however, Samson crossed into Armorica, Meven and his friend Austell accompanied him. Samson settled at Dol, about the year 550.² He at once employed Meven to agitate against Conmore, the usurper of Domnonia.³ In order to draw Weroch, Count of Bro-Weroch, into the conspiracy, he despatched Meven across the great central forest which the British colonists called Trecoet, or Brécilien.

On his way, Meven came on a clearing that had been made by a British settler called Caduon, or Cadfan, who, having no children proposed to Meven to settle at a suitable distance, and found a lan, and he, on his part, undertook to make over his plou, on his death, to Meven, so that all his lands and its colonists over whom he exercised jurisdiction should pass eventually under the authority of Meven as its secular and ecclesiastical chief. To this Meven consented, and this originated the abbey of S. Méen in Montfort. With the assistance of Samson, Judual, the rightful heir to Domnonia, defeated and killed Conmore. On the death of Judual he was succeeded by his son Juthael, who died about the year 608, when the third son of Juthael, named Hoeloc, usurped the throne, and his foster-father Rethwal murdered all the brothers of Hoeloc on whom he could lay his hands. The eldest, Judicael, to save his throat, took sanctuary with S. Meven, who shaved his head and put on him the monastic habit.

Hoeloc had a residence in Goelo, as that portion of Brittany was called, where was the abbey of S. Meven. One day, as Meven was passing under its walls, he heard the lamentations of a servant of the

¹ "Ista pusilla . . . ad mundanas voluptates data est." Vita S. Samsonis in Mabillon, Acta SS.O.S.B., sæc. i, p. 162.

² "Dol—cujus nomen, ut aiunt, a quodam eventu Dolis dicitur." If the author had been a Briton he would have known that Dol signifies a fruitful bottom or meadow by the water.

³ "Ad Guerocum comitem ut . . . sibi auxilium ferret, beatum Conaidum transmittere decrevit."

Small Count. with . . .
by . . .

prince who was in a dungeon under sentence of death. Meven at once thrust his way to the presence of the tyrant, and implored pardon for the wretch ; but Hoeloc angrily turned him out of his caer or house. However, perhaps by the connivance of the gaoler, the man was allowed to escape, and he fled for sanctuary to S. Meven. Hoeloc was highly incensed, and went to the monastery and demanded that his servant should be surrendered. When Meven refused, the tyrant violated the sanctuary, and carried the man away. As, however, the horse he rode soon after stumbled and threw the prince, who broke his thigh, in a panic Hoeloc, regarding this as a "judgment" on him for breaking sanctuary, released the prisoner, and made his peace with the abbot.

Hoeloc then lived on better terms with the ecclesiastics, and favoured S. Malo, who was a kinsman of S. Meven, though at first he had treated him badly.

The story is told—a sufficiently hackneyed one—of Meven having delivered the neighbourhood from a dragon that lived by the river Loyre. He passed his stole round the beast, and led it to the bank of the river, into which he precipitated it. This is only a figurative way of saying that he tamed Hoeloc. The account of the death of the Saint, and of his words to S. Austell, has already been given.¹ He died in or about 611.

His day is June 21 in almost all the Brittany Calendars, but the fifteenth century missal of S. Malo gives June 19. The feast at Mevagissey is on June 29 ; at S. Mewan five weeks before Christmas.

In Cornwall he is patron of S. Mewan and Mevagissey, and had a chapel in S. Austell. In the Taxatio of 1291, S. Mewan is S. Mawan ; in the Register of Bishop Brantyngham, 1370, Eccl. S^{ti} Mewani ; so also in that of Bishop Stafford, 1403-4. In Brittany he is patron of S. Méen, of Cancale, of Plélan, of S. Méen-Ploudaniel, of Trémeven, Lanvallay, Lesneven, etc. He is represented in a statue at Lanvallay, as bald, habited in a long mantle, holding a crozier in his right hand, and a book in his left. His tomb is at S. Méen, with a statue over it of the fourteenth century.

S. MINVER, see S. MENEFRIDA

S. MIRGINT, Confessor

In the grant by Caradog, son of Rhiwallon, of "Villa Gunhucc in Guartha Cum," to the Church of Llandaff, in the time of Bishop

¹ i, p. 189.

Herwald, who was consecrated in 1056, mention is made of "the four saints of Llangwm, Miringt, Cinficc, Huui, and Eruen."¹ There are two Llangwms in Monmouthshire, Llangwm Ucha and Isa, forming one benefice, the churches of which are to-day dedicated to S. Jerome and S. John respectively.

Miringt's name does not appear to occur anywhere else.

S. MODDWID, see S. MEDDWID

S. MOLING, Bishop, Confessor

MOLING, in Welsh, Mylling or Myllin, was a famed ecclesiastic and politician of the seventh century. Several MS. Lives of him exist.

One, that appears to have been a panegyric on his festival, is in the so called Codex Kilkenniensis, in Bishop Marsh's Library, Dublin. Of this an English translation has been published by Patrick O'Leary, "With Notes and Traditions," Dublin, 1887.

A Latin Life from the Salamanca Codex is given in Acta SS. Hiberniæ, Edinburgh, 1888, pp. 819-26; the same in Acta SS. Boll., June, III, pp. 408-10.

His Irish "Birth and Life" occurs in three MSS. (1) The so-called Liber Flavus Fergusiorum, a vellum of the end of the fourteenth or the beginning of the fifteenth century, now in the Library of the Royal Irish Academy. (2) The Brussels MS. 4190-4200, written by Michael O'Clery in 1628-9. (3) The Brussels MS. 5301. The Irish text of the first two MSS. has been edited, with translation, by Dr. Whitley Stokes, in the Revue Celtique, xxvii (1906), pp. 257-305; xxviii, p. 70.

There is a full Life of the Saint in O'Hanlon's Lives of the Irish Saints, vi, pp. 691-724; and a compendium in Bishop Comerford's Collections relating to the Diocese of Kildare and Leighlin, iii, pp. 305-9.

S. Moling's father was called Faolain, and he was descended from Cathair Mór, monarch of Ireland, and seventh in descent from a brother of Crimthan Cas, the first Christian king of Leinster. The father had been a brugaidh, or farmer, at Luachair, now Slieve Lougher, a wild upland district near Castle Island, in Kerry, who settled finally in the country of the Hy Cinnsealach, on the river Barrow, and there probably Moling was born, though the Ossorians suppose that the place of his birth was at Mullennakill, in the parish of Jerpoint West some four miles north-west of Roscommon. He embraced the religious life at an early age, and founded a monastery at Ross Bruic, Badger Wood, on the Barrow, then called Tech Moling, and now S. Mullins, in the county of Carlow. His baptismal name had been Daircell or Taircheall, but he is commonly known as Moling Luachra. For awhile he was at Glendalough, and then was appointed Bishop of Ferns, co. Wexford. There he laboured with his own hands to conduct a stream of water for the distance of a mile to his episcopal residence. This occupied him for seven years, and he prayed that thenceforth all who should paddle in this stream, walking up it against the current, should have their sins remitted, and should secure eternal life in Heaven.

¹ Book of Llan Dâu, p. 274.

A great number of miracles are attributed to him, most of them absurd. We do not give his Life at any length, because there is no certainty that Moling ever visited Britain, though according to the Dublin copy of the Annals of Tighernach, he died in Britain. This, however, is not the account given in his Lives.

Moling Luachra was largely instrumental in the abandonment of the hated Boromha tribute imposed on the men of Leinster, which had been a fertile source of insurrection and bloodshed. He contrived its remission by trickery. He had been sent on a mission to King Fianachta "the Festive" (673-95) from Leinster to complain of the hardship of the tribute. Much opposition was raised to his request, and, as the king hesitated, "Grant me, O king, that this question be not again raised till luan."

To this Fianachta consented, supposing that it was merely postponed till Monday. But luan has a double signification; it means Doomsday as well as Monday. The celebrated Adamnan bitterly reproached the king for allowing himself to be outwitted by Moling. The story is told that Fianachta, repenting of having yielded, sent men after Moling and his clerics as they were leaving for Leinster. Moling proceeded thundering forth a hymn of his own composition in praise of holy Virgins, beginning with S. Brigid, and winding up with the Blessed Virgin Mary, and a sudden drift of fog came over the hillside, and threw out those who were in pursuit.

A very curious Irish poem in praise of S. Moling is attributed to the Devil, who visited the Saint, and asked for his blessing. This Moling declined to give him. "Well then," said Satan, "curse me roundly." "Why should I do that?" inquired the Saint. "Because, if you cursed, the curse would recoil on and cleave to your own lips." Then the Evil One asked for advice. Moling replied, "Kneel in prayer." "That is beyond my powers," replied Satan, “for my knees bend backward.” “Then I can do nothing for you,” said Moling. But Satan, thereupon, composed and intoned a hymn in praise of holiness.

He is pure gold, he is a heaven round the sun,
He is a vessel of silver full of wine,
He is an angel, he is the wisdom of saints,
Such is he who doeth the will of the King.

He is a bird round which closes a trap,
He is a leaky vessel in dangerous peril,
He is an empty bowl, he is a withered tree,
Such is he who doeth not the will of the King.

He is a sweet branch in full bloom,
He is a goblet filled with honey,
He is a precious stone very choice,
Such is he who doeth the will of God's Son in heaven.

He is a blind nut, wherein is no profit,
He is stinking rottenness, he is a withered tree,
He is a wild apple branch that blossoms not,
Such is he who doeth not the will of the King.

and so on. The whole story and the hymn are in the Book of Leinster.

In his old age, Moling retired from Ferns to Tech Moling, and he died on June 17, in the year 696.¹

An odd story of S. Moling getting into S. Aidan's bed, and being seized with cramps for so doing, is told in the Life of that Saint.²

If he was denied rest in S. Aidan's bed, he at all events occupied his seat at Ferns.

Moling is usually regarded as one of the four prophets of Ireland. The Evangelistarium of S. Moling, fragments of a copy of the Gospels in its case or shrine, is preserved in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin.

The church of Llanfyllin, in Montgomeryshire, is dedicated to S. Moling, or Myllin. It is not easy to account for the dedication, inasmuch as there is no evidence that he ever visited Wales. There is a holy well of his in the parish, called Ffynnon Fyllin, and Ffynnon Coed Llan. It is on the left side of the by-road leading from the Rectory to the summit of Coed Llan.

The Irish and Welsh Calendars agree in giving his day on June 17. Whytford, in his Addicyons to the Martiloge, under that day, says: “In yrelond the feest of saynt Molyng, a bysshop of synguler sanctite, & had reuelacyon of aūgels, & he reysed a kynges sone to lyfe and cured the blynde & defe, dombe & lame, lepres & dyuerse infyrmytees & many grete myracles.”

¹ The Annals of Clonmacnois place his demise at 692; the Chronicon Scottorum at 693; the Annals of the Four Masters at 696, which is also the date given by the Annals of Tighernach. Duaid Mac Firbis accepted this latter date as correct.

² Cambro-British Saints, pp. 249-250; see Y Cymmrodor, xiii, p. 92.

A fair was held at Llanfyllin on June 17, O.S., and is still held on the 28th.¹

Dafydd ab Gwilym,² in the fourteenth century, makes use of the expression, “Myn Myllin nef!”

S. MONACELLA, see S. MELANGELL

S. MONYNNA, Virgin, Abbess

FEW Lives of Saints present greater difficulties than that of Monenna or Monynna, for she has been confounded with Modwenna of Burton-on-Trent. But this is not all. There were two Monynnas, one in the North of Ireland, the other in the South, who lived at different periods; and there were, as well, two Modwennas, also separated from one another by a considerable tract of time. Yet all four have been run into one.

The Life that we have has been attributed to one Concubran, who died in 1082. It is printed in the Acta SS. Boll., Jul. II, pp. 297-312. It exists in MS. in the British Museum, Cotton MS. Cleopatra A. ii, a MS. of the eleventh century. Another version was by Geoffrey of Burton, and this is in Royal MS. 15. B. iv, of the thirteenth century. John of Tynemouth condensed them in a Life that is printed in Capgrave's Nova Legenda Angliæ. An Irish Life, or rather a Life in Latin written in Ireland, of Monynna alias Darerca, is in the Acta SS. Hiberniæ in Cod. Sal., coll. 165-88. This confounds the two Monynnas, but does not confound with them Modwenna of Burton.

We will take the Modwennas first.

1. Modwenna was an Irish Abbess who was visited in Ireland by Alfrid, son of Oswy, in 670, when he fled to Ireland, and, as Bede informs us, remained there for some time. Afterwards Modwenna crossed into Northumbria, and Alfrid, who was King in 685, placed her over the monastery founded by S. Hilda at Whitby, and committed to her charge his sister, Elfleda. After a brief stay, she returned to Ireland, but hearing that her brother, Ronan, was labouring in

¹ For an account of the observance latterly of the Gwyl Mabsant, see Golud yr Oes, Carnarvon, i (1863), p. 510. The river Cain is called Myllon above Llanfyllin.

² Barddoniaeth, ed. 1789, p. 37.

Scotland, she sent some of her spiritual daughters there to assist him in his work. The probable date of her death would be circa 695.

2. Modwenna, abbess of Burton-on-Trent, was the instructress of S. Edith of Polesworth. Edith was the sister of Athelstan, and great-aunt of Edith of Wilton, who died in 984; and the death of her great-aunt, widow of Sithric of Northumbria, took place about 954. We may accordingly calculate that the death of Modwenna fell at the close of the ninth century, or early in the tenth.¹

3. Monynna, daughter of Mochta, of the diocese of Armagh, received the veil from S. Patrick. Her principal house was Fochard, near Dundalk. According to the Annals of Ulster she died in 518; according to those of the Four Masters, in 517, in the reign of Murchertach Mac Earca, who ruled from 508 to 533. The Chronicon Scotorum gives 514 as the date of death.

4. Monynna, disciple of S. Ibar, cannot have been the same as the preceding, for her sphere of work was in the South of Ireland, whereas her name-sake was active as a founder in the North. She lived later than Monynna, daughter of Mochta.

What makes the confusion worse confounded is that Monynna is not a proper name. It is Mo-nin, "my dear nun," a term of endearment given to a spiritual mother, and consequently applied to others.

Thus there was a Monynna who attended the Synod of Easdra, which took place before the banishment of S. Columcille in 563, or, more probably, after that of Drumceatt, in 590.²

The confusion caused by the identification of the two Monynnas led to the attempt to explain it by giving to Monynna a life lasting to the age of 180.

The explanation of the name Monynna is given in the Féilire of Oengus: "Moninne, i.e., 'My-mindach' the nuns used to call her, and of Ui-Echach of Ulster was she, i.e., Moninne, daughter of Mochta, son of Lilach, son of Lugaid, son of Rossa, son of Imchad, son of Fedlimid, son of Cas, son of Fiachra Araide, son of Oengus Goibniu; as a poet said:—

Nine score years together,
According to rule, without warmth,
Without folly, without crime, without fault,
Was the age of Moninne.

¹ Geoffrey of Burton mistakes Alfrid of Northumbria, who visited Ireland in 670, with Alfred the Great, who reigned from 871 to 901; and identifies Ellfeda, the sister of Alfrid, who was Abbess of Whitby, and died in 715, with Edith of Polesworth, grand-daughter of Alfred the Great, who must have died about 954.

² Vita Sti. Ferannani in Colgan, Acta SS. Hibern., cap. vii, pp. 337. 339.

Since she took a girdle on her body,
It is according to knowledge of her that I hear
She ate not her fill of food,
Monnine of Slieve Gullion.

“ Moninne of Slieve Gullion, and Sarbile was her name previously, or Darerca was her name at first. But a certain poet fasted with her, and the first thing he said (after being miraculously cured of his dumbness) was Ninnin. Hence the nun was called Mo-ninde, and the poet himself Nine-ecis. Mo-nine quasi Monanna the nuns used to call her. A sister of Mary (was she) for she was a virgin, even as Mary.”¹

What appears clearly enough from the above is that there were two Monynnas, one whose original name was Darerca, and this was the daughter of Mochta; there was also another named Sarbile or Orbilia, as she appears in the Vita Moninnæ alias Darercæ.

Of the parentage of the latter nothing is recorded, but she occurs as Sarbhil in the Martyrologies of Tallaght and Donegal on September 4, and as of Fochard; consequently she must have succeeded Monynna alias Darerca in the charge of this house of hers in Louth; and it is possible enough that she also may have acquired the affectionate designation of “ my dear nun ” given to her mistress and predecessor. She it is, perhaps, who attended the Synod of Easdra, if it occurred at the earlier date to which it is attributed. But she, again, is distinct from the Leinster Monynna.

Of the first Monynna, the outlines of her Life come out clearly enough. Her pedigree was well known, and distinguished, and her family held a position of importance in the neighbourhood of Armagh. When S. Patrick visited that part of Ireland, she was baptized by him, and confirmed by him, and from him received the veil; and she is reckoned among his disciples.² Under his direction she remained for some time, and then he committed her to the charge of a priest living near her father’s home, in proximity to Armagh, that she might learn the Psalter.

In course of time she founded a monastic establishment at Fochard, near Dundalk, in the County of Louth. But after a while she left it and went to Slieve Cuillin or Gullion, as it is now called, and her cill there now bears the name of Killeavy. It is situated in a wild spot on the mountains, near a loch that has traditions associated with Fionn Mac Cumhall and his people. And here she died in 527 or 518.

¹ Félire of Oengus, ed. Whitley Stokes, p. cxvi.

² Trias Thaumaturga, appen. l. v, ad Acta S. Patri ii, cap. xxiii, p. 27c.

A Monynna was venerated in Scotland, the sister of S. Ronan; and she is said to have died at Longfortin. This is the Modwenna No. 1.¹

In dealing with the Life of Monynna of Leinster, we must put aside all that appertains to the two Modwennas. This is easy enough. Then we have to disentangle the Acts of the Northern and Southern Monynnas, which is not so easy. The Life in the Salamanca Codex has in it nothing about Modwenna.

Monynna alias Darerca associated with herself eight virgins, and a widow who joined her, along with her little son, Lugaid by name, who afterwards became a bishop.² She placed herself under the direction of S. Ibar, of Begery, in Wexford Harbour.

Hearing of the virtues of S. Brigid, Monynna visited her, and remained with her for a while at Kildare. Then she returned to Ibar, who commended to her charge a girl of whom he had formed a high opinion. Monynna, however, with a woman's eye, saw through her at once, and said to the bishop, "I have a shrewd notion that this young woman and I will never agree, and that in the end one of us will have to go." In fact, after some years, this girl headed a faction in the convent against Monynna, that led to the expulsion of the abbess, with fifty of her nuns, who clave to her.

When thus turned out of her own house, Monynna went back to Brigid. As she died in 503, and Brigid in 525, this Leinster Monynna was beginning her monastic education when her name-sake in the North of Ireland was drawing to the end of her days.

The occasion of the revolt in the monastery was, apparently, due to the too great strictness of Monynna's rule, for we are told that, whilst she was lavish to strangers and beggars, she half-starved the sisters, so that Ibar was constrained to interfere. Indeed, she allowed them to eat "only raw herbs, tree-bark, and roots."

One day a pig-driver lost his herd, and by her instrumentality they were found, whereupon he offered her one of the swine for a meal. She refused it, and we may conjecture that the prospect of a good dinner off pork, thus denied them, caused the final explosion of ill-will that led to her being driven out of her own monastery.

In the Life the two Monynnas are so mixed up that it is not always possible to distinguish the incidents connected with each. The author goes on to say that she had a monastery at Kilslieve-Cuillin, in Armagh, but this certainly belongs to the other Saint of the same name ; and then follows a story which most probably belongs to the second. Some bishops were on their way to visit her, when they were waylaid by a band of freebooters, under one Glunelach, or Glunsealach, and murdered. Monynna heard of this and went with her nuns to recover the bodies. When encountering the robber and murderer, she reprimanded him with such severity that he was frightened. That night he had a dream. He thought Heaven was opened and that Monynna pointed out to him a throne set in a flowery meadow, and told him that it might be his if he repented.

¹ Forbes, Kalendars of Scottish SS., pp. 404-7

² But this may pertain to the Ulster Monynna. Lugaid became a Bishop near Carlingford.

Next day Glunsealach and his nephew, Aelfinn or Alfin, came to Monynna, and begged to be instructed in the way of God. She sent them to S. Coemgen of Glendalough, who baptized them, and both led thenceforth such holy lives that Glunsealach was elevated to the episcopate, and he and Alfin were numbered with the Saints, and are commemorated on June 3, along with their master Coemgen.

Now, as S. Coemgen, or Kevin, died in 618 or 619, it is clear that the conversion cannot have been effected by Monynna of Fochard who died a century earlier. Moreover, a Saint in Armagh would hardly have committed her proselyte to a Saint in the South of Ireland ; and that her convent was at no great distance from Glendalough appears from the tale, which is sufficiently curious and characteristic to be told more at large.

Monynna had taken Glunsealach and his nephew into the convent, where they lived "litas discentes et cum virginibus cohabitantes."

Now, it came to the ears of Coemgen that Monynna had promised to her reclaimed highwayman that she would take away the throne in Heaven ordained for Coemgen, and give it to him.¹

When this story reached Coemgen, who had now been seven years living an eremitical life at Glendalough, he was full of rage, and armed his monks and servants, and they went to the convent with full purpose to burn it down, and kill Monynna and her nuns, and above all Glunsealach.

Monynna heard that they were coming, and, at the head of her spiritual daughters, went to meet the irate Saint, and to pacify him, which after a while she succeeded in doing ; and then she gave up to his charge the converted murderer and his nephew, that their perfecting might be done by Coemgen, and so redound to his credit.²

¹ Vita by John of Tynemouth in Capgrave, Nova Legenda Angliæ.

² "What avail my seven years of rigorous life in the desert, my vigils, sighs and moans, the nettles, mallows and wild herbs, raw, that I have eaten, the bark of trees and roots and wild fruit . . . if my mansion in Heaven is to be taken from me by Modwenna, and given to a robber ?" The author, however,

Then she conducted Coemgen and his fellows to a tank she had formed, and to which was led a stream of tepid water. "There," said she, "off with your clothes and get in, and wash off your nasty temper."

The biographer goes on to say that Monynna went about founding religious houses in all directions, which provoked a good deal of ridicule in some, but to which of the abbesses of the same name this applies we do not know.

The Life by Concubran and that by Geoffrey of Burton now drift away to Modwenna, and are quite regardless of chronology. Monynna is made a contemporary of Congal or Conald II, who reigned at the close of the seventh century, or of Congal III, who was slain in 956. Also, King Alfred the Great, when a prince, comes to Ireland to be miraculously cured by her of a grievous infirmity; and then she goes to England, and is given Edith of Polesworth to be her pupil.

The Life in the Salamanca Codex is free from this absurdity. It says that she founded her monastery at a place called "Caput Litoris," a four days' journey from Kildare, but this applies to the Saint of Fochard.

Desiring a good Rule of Life, she sent one of her maidens, Brig or Brignat, across to Rosnat or Cill-Muine (S. David's), to obtain thence the best monastic regulations.

One night, when the sisters had risen for Matins, and were about to commence the Psalms, Monynna stopped them. "Know," said she, "that our prayers hover about in the roof and cannot rise. That is due to one of you having committed a fault."

After a long silence, one of the sisters, a widow, rose and said: "It is true. I am to blame. I suffer from cold feet, and so a man I know gave me a pair of woollen stockings, and I am wearing them."

Monynna ordered them there and then to be stripped off and thrown into the river, after which the arrested prayers were able to get through the roof.¹

As the time of Monynna's death drew on, the faithful Brig or Brignat was wont to watch at her cell, and she saw two swans fly away from it. She mentioned this to her mistress, who was very angry at her prying, and foretold that in consequence she would become blind. The Salamanca Life says that in her last moments Monynna was ministered makes this a suggestion of the Devil. Rather, it was what Coemgen said to himself.

¹ "Duos sotulares a quodam viro . . . confiteor me recipesse, et oblivione retardante, licentiam vestram non habui; quos propter frigus in pedibus porto" Cod. Sal., col. 181.

to by her old director S. Ibar, whom it calls Herbeus ; but this is impossible, as Ibar died in 503.

We come now to the question whether she be the same as the Mwynen represented to be a daughter of the Irishman Brynach, and his wife Corth, daughter of Brychan.¹ It is possible. The Brychan family had many connexions with precisely that part of Ireland where she lived. According to the Tract on the Mothers of the Saints, Mogoroc, Abbot of Delgany, in Wicklow, was a son of Brychan ; Cynog was also for a while in Ireland, also in Wicklow ; Mobeoc and Cairbre, other sons, were in Wexford ; so was another, Elloc by name, and a daughter, Cairine, was in Wexford.²

This points to established and close intercourse between the family of Brychan and South Ireland ; and this same family occupied the North-east of Cornwall. Mwynen's brother (or uncle), Berwyn, is expressly said to have settled in Cornwall, where he was murdered, and Nicolas Roscarrock assures us that this Berwyn is the Bruer of S. Breward, and that the place of his martyrdom was shown in his day (1549-1634).

Considering the connexion, it is probable that the Brychan clan in Wales would desire to have there one of their own family to organize the education of the daughters of the colony, and who so suitable ? Of direct evidence there is none. At the best we have but a presumption. But the Irish authorities tell us nothing of the family of Monynna of Leinster.

The foundations in Cornwall—not necessarily made by Monynna in person, but by disciples, and affiliated to her head house, and under her rule, would be Morwenstow, Marhamchurch, perhaps S. Minver, and S. Merryn.

The following tradition relative to S. Morwenna is in a MS. at Portledge, of about 1610. "Morwinstow its name is from S. Moorin. The tradition is that, when the parishioners were about to build their church, this Saint went down under a cliff, and chose a stone for the font, which she brought up upon her head. In her way, being weary, she laid down the stone, and rested herself, out of which place sprang a well, from thence called S. Moorwin's Well. Then she took it up and carried it to the place where now the church standeth. The parishioners had begun their church in another place, and there did convey this stone, but what was built by day was pulled down by night, and the materials carried to this place ; whereupon they forbore and built it in the place they were directed to by a wonder." ¹

¹ See under S. MWYNEN, further on.

² Shearman, Loca Patriciana, Table VIII. Colgan, Acta SS. Hibern., p. 311. Colgan attributes the tract to Oengus ; it was probably by Mac Fibriss.

The day of S. Morwenna, Modwenna, or Monynna is July 5. She is entered on this day in a Calendar of Reading Abbey (1220-46), Cotton MS. Vesp. E. v ; also in a Calendar of the thirteenth or fourteenth century, Additional MS. 27,866 ; and in both editions of Wilson's Martyrologie. Also in Whytford, who gives both July 5 and September 9. In the Irish Calendars, those of Tallaght, O'Gorman, Cashel, Donegal, and the Drummond Calendar, on July 6, as Monynna of Slieve Cuillin, now Killeevy, in Armagh.

The feast at S. Merryn is on July 7.² That at Marhamchurch is on August 12. At Morwenstow on June 24, as both the Church and Holy Well were withdrawn from S. Morwenna, and placed under the patronage of S. John Baptist. The feast at S. Minver, according to William of Worcester, is on November 24. Roscarrock says November 23.

At Morwenstow Church is a fresco representing the Saint as a nun, with one hand raised in benediction, and the other holding something indistinguishable, in her hand, to her breast. In Art she could be appropriately figured as an Irish Abbess in white, and with a swan at her side.

S. MOR, Confessor

THREE persons of this name have been supposed to be Welsh Saints, but the authorities are late.

1. Mor, son of Ceneu ab Coel.³ He was the father of Arthwys, and also, according to the late genealogies, of S. Cynllo.

2. Mor, son of Pasgen ab Urien Rheged, and brother of Gwrifyw and Llamined (or Lleminod) Angel. He is said to have been buried in Bardsey.⁴

3. A Mor mentioned in a hagiological note, of late date, in the *Iolo MSS.*⁵ : "Mor ab Morien brought (hither) Baptism and Faith (i.e., the Christian Religion), but would not bring Baptism into Gwynedd.

¹ Transactions of the Exeter Dioc. Arch. Soc., i, pt. 2, Second Series, p. 216.

² Nicolas Roscarrock says that in his day he heard S. Merryn or Marina called Morwenna.

³ Iolo MSS., p. 126. In Bonedd Gwyr y Gogledd in Peniarth MS. 45 he occurs as Mar ; cf. the Mar of Margam, Cambro-British Saints, p. 22.

⁴ Iolo MSS., pp. 128, 145.

⁵ Pp. 146, 263-4.

The first that did so was Gwydion ab Dôn. . . . Mor afterwards went to Rome and Jerusalem."

The last named may be at once dismissed ; his association with the Culture Hero, is, to say the least, unfortunate. The other two, though genuine as regards their existence and their pedigrees, do not occur as Saints in any early Bonedd y Saint, the sole authority for them being the Iolo MSS. There was undoubtedly a Saint of the name, but nothing authentic is known of his origin.¹ His protection, with that of many other Saints, is invoked in an ode for Henry VII ;² and Lewis Glyn Cothi,³ about the same time, also invokes his protection for the subject of one of his eulogies. His festival does not occur in any of the Welsh Calendars, but it is mentioned as Gwyl For, without date, several times in the late additions to the Laws of Hywel Dda.⁴ The name Mor, though not common, was by no means rare in early Welsh history.

There are three churches that are doubtfully attributed to Mor as patron. In the case of two he is usually coupled with another Saint, in fact, their true patrons. They are Llanfor, in Penllyn, Merionethshire, Llannor, in Lley, Carnarvonshire, and Llanynys, in Denbighshire. Rees assigns the three to Mor ab Ceneu, associating with him Deiniol in the dedication of Llanfor,⁵ and Saeran in that of Llanynys.⁶ The latter is, with much more probability, attributed⁷ to Saeran alone ; and there can be no manner of doubt as to the dedication of Llanfor to Deiniol. Of this there is sufficient evidence. As supplementing what has been already said,⁸ may be cited the references in elegies by three bards of the early sixteenth century to parishioners who were buried at Llanfor. Lewys Môn, in his elegy to Rhys Llwyd, of Gydros, mentions "Eglwys Deinioel" as his place of sepulture ; Tudur Aled, in his to Wiliam ab Morys, of Rhiwaedog, says that he was buried "dan weryd Deinioel" ; and similarly Rhys Cain, in his to Elsbeth Owain, of Rhiwaedog, "mewn gweryd Deinioel." The true dedication of Llannor is the Holy Cross, September 14.⁹

The error, in the case of Llanfor and Llannor, is, on the face of it, comparatively recent. Mor has been simply read into the two names. The early forms of both would now appear as Llan Fawr—as one word becoming Llanfor (cf. Dolfor, Trefor, Nanmor, etc.). In the Taxatio

¹ See under S. MAGNUS ; Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, p. 470.

² Iolo MSS., p. 314.

³ Gwraith, 1837, p. 88.

⁴ Ed. Aneurin Owen, folio, pp. 522, 686, 700.

⁵ Welsh Saints, 1836, pp. 117-8, 341.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 118, 271, 334.

⁷ E.g., Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 278.

⁸ ii, p. 330.

⁹ Willis, Bangor, p. 275.

of 1254 Llanor occurs as "Lan Vaur"; in that of 1291 as "Llanvavr";¹ and Llanfor in the latter as "Lanvaur." The name means "The Large Church," but neither church could be described as "large" now. As applied to Llanfor, mawr may have had reference to the large size of the original parish, and, as well might be assumed, of its church also in the early Middle Age. Until the middle of last century, when three parishes were carved out of it, Llanfor was a very extensive parish, embracing an area of over 20,000 acres. Llanor at one time included also Pwllheli.

S. MORAN or MODERAN, Bishop, Confessor

THE parish church of Lamorran (Lan-Moran), in Cornwall, is dedicated to this Saint. The district is one of irregular settlements. In Brittany S. Moran is known and venerated.

Nicolas Roscarrock calls him Moran or Morwene, and says that his day as observed at Lamorran was the Tuesday before All Saints' Day. This is about the time in which he is commemorated in the Roman and Gallican Martyrologies, October 22.

Moran's or Moderan's Life by an anonymous writer has been published by Dom Plaine in Studien u. Mittheilungen aus dem Benedict. u. d. Cisterc. Orden, Jahrg. viii, 1887, pp. 196-201. See also Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B., sæc. iii, 1, pp. 517-21. Mention is also made of the Saint by Flodoard.

Moran was son of the Count of Tornacis.⁴ He was destined for the church, and brought up by Desiderius, Bishop of Rennes. The story goes, that his father went to Britain, and there fell desperately in love with a young and noble maiden. He determined to marry her, keeping back the fact that he had a wife in Gaul, and to remain the rest of his days in her native island. But the night before the marriage Moran appeared to his father, and gave him so severe a lecture on his conduct, and on the immorality of persuading a maiden to marriage when his wife was alive, that the Count ran away from his intended bride, and sneaked back to Brittany. He probably trusted that the news of his adventure would not reach Tornacis, and the ears of his wife. But he was undeceived; his son had revealed his father's delinquency, which was an unworthy and ungenerous proceeding, and the Count's life thenceforth at home was anything but peaceful.

¹ So to a late period, especially in poetry; e.g., "Llanfawr yn Llŷn" (1649), in Cefn Coch MSS., 1899, p. 17. For the elision of f see under S. MABON. The name is the same as the Breton Lanveur.

In the reign of Chilperic Moran was made Bishop of Rennes. Amelo, Count of Rennes, was a thorn in his side, vexing the Church with his exactions and violence, and Moran, to escape these annoyances, or from motives of piety, resolved on absenting himself from his see for awhile, on the plea of a pilgrimage to Rome. He passed through Rheims, where the treasurer of the church gratified him with some choice relics—a portion of the stole, horsehair shirt, and handkerchief of S. Remigius. He continued his route to Rome, and crossed Monte Bardone, one of the Apennines near Parma. There he made the vow that, should he reach Rome in safety, he would spend the rest of his days on this charming spot. As the major portion of his journey and most of its perils were passed, it is pretty clear that he had made up his mind to remain there, and not return to the dull country of Rennes, and the vexations of an insolent Count. On his way back from Rome, having happily accomplished his journey in safety, he found that his legs inexorably refused to move into the plain below the mountains, and only when he communicated to his companions his intention of settling there did they regain their flexibility and power of locomotion. He seems to have reconsidered the matter, and seen that it was absolutely necessary for him to return to Rennes and formally resign his bishopric. This he therefore did. He gave up his office into the hands of his grand vicar, Aunscand, who was consecrated in his room, and then he hastened back to Monte Bardone, and built on its slopes a monastery called Berzetto. He died there about the year 730, and was buried on the left hand of the altar.

Flodoard gives another version of the story. Moran forgot his relics, and left them hanging on the branches of a leafy oak. On his road he remembered them, and sent back a clerk named Wulfhad for them; but the clerk could not reach them, for the bough lifted them into the air, high over his head. The bishop then returned, but he could not recover his relics till he had made a vow to leave a portion of them there in a little chapel dedicated to S. Abundius. Luitprand, King of the Lombards, hearing of the miracle, gave him lands on Monte Bardone in honour of S. Remigius.

The district in which Lamorran is situated is between two creeks of the Fal, and has near by dedications to S. Clement, and S. Cornelius, to the Irish S. Feacc, and the Cornish S. Cubi (Cybi). The explanation of the existence near Truro of a dedication to a peculiarly uninteresting Breton Saint is to be found in the migration of the Bretons to our island. Rennes was not included in Brittany till after the conquests of Nominoe in 846-50. The border land or marches were ravaged remorselessly by Franks and Bretons indiscriminately, and it is quite possible that some of the inhabitants of these marches then abandoned their homes; but the great exodus took place later, and was due to the incursions of the Northmen. "The Danes and Northmen burnt the towns, the castles, the churches, the monasteries, the houses, ravaged the country, desolated Brittany through its length and breadth, till they had reduced the whole land to a solitude, to one vast desert. Then it was that the bodies of the Saints were taken out of the land."¹ Another chronicler says: "As the pirates by the permission of the Almighty devastated the whole of Brittany and reduced it to servitude, the inhabitants, overwhelmed by the invaders, abandoned their homes, and found places of refuge in other lands, but carried away with them the precious relics of the Saints."²

The Nantes Chronicler says: "At this time (i.e., at the beginning of the invasion of 919) Mathuedoi, Count of Poher, escaped to Athelstan, King of England, with a crowd of Bretons (cum ingenti multitudine Britonum), and with his son, Alan, whom he had of the daughter of Duke Alan the Great, and who later was called Barbetorte. King Athelstan had before held this son at the font, and because of this spiritual tie, was greatly attached to him."³ There is an inaccuracy in this. Athelstan was not king in 919 or 920; but the fact that Mathuedoi and crowds of fugitives went to Britain is not disturbed by this slip.

We may suspect that the introduction of the cult, and the foundation of a church to S. Moran, was due to these refugees, who would more readily go to a Celtic part of Britain than any other.

S. Moran or Moderan is given by Albert le Grand on October 22; also in the Rennes Breviary of 1627; also in Saussaye's Gallican Martyrology. But on May 13 in the thirteenth century Breviary of S. Yves, at Tréguier, and on May 16 in the MS. Breviary of S. Melanuis, at Rennes, due apparently to a translation of relics.

There is a grant of Lan in a charter of St. Birk C.S.

S. MORDAF

MORDAF, generally called Mordaf Hael, or the Generous, has been included among the Welsh Saints in two late documents printed in the Iolo MSS.,¹ but without any authority whatever. He was the son of Serfan ab Cedig ab Dyfnwal Hên,² and one of the "Men of the North," who were warriors. In the chapter headed "The Privileges of Arfon" in the Venedotian Code of the Welsh Laws,³ we are told that he, with Clydno Eiddin, Nudd Hael, and Rhydderch Hael—all northern chieftains—invaded Arfon, in the time of Rhun ab Maelgwn Gwynedd, to avenge the death of Elidyr Mwynfawr, another of the "Men of the North," and devastated Arfon. He is celebrated in the Triads,⁴ with Rhydderch and Nudd, as one of the "Three Generous Ones of the Isle of Britain." There is no evidence that he at any time devoted himself to religion.

¹ Vet. Coll. MS. De rebus Britannia in De la Borderie, Hist. de Bretagne T. ii, p. 356.

² Ibid., p. 357.

³ Chron. Namn., ed. Merlet, pp. 82-3.

The compilers of the Iolo Achau'r Saint probably thought that the inclusion of Mordaf would account for the name Llanforda, now borne by one of the townships of Oswestry, where is also a brook, Morda. Leland⁵ says, "Morda risith in a hille caullid Llanvarda wher was a chirch now decaid." Llanfordaf simply means "the Church on the Mordaf brook." There is nothing unusual in a river bearing a man's name; in fact, it is a common characteristic of the names of Welsh rivers, especially brooks.

"Lanvorda" was a chapel formerly in the parish of Llanedern, near Cardiff, which is mentioned in a document of 1393, and also in one of 1236 as "Lanbordan." Another "Lambordan," mentioned in 1392, was at Coed y Gores, in the parish of Roath, Cardiff; it is now a cottage called Ty'r Capel. There is a place of the same name in the parish of Llangattock Feibion Afel, near Monmouth.⁶

? Llanvorda or Lan Bawdore

S. MORDEYRN, Confessor

THE cywydd in praise of Mordeyrn, "an honoured Saint in Nantglyn," by the sixteenth century bard Dafydd ab Llywelyn ab Madog,⁷

¹ Pp. 106, 138. For a "saying" attributed to him, see ibid., p. 253.

² Bonedd Gwyr y Gogledd. Mordaf is a somewhat rare name. It was borne by the blind man in Hanes Taliessin, and by the Bishop of Bangor who accompanied Hywel Dda to Rome for the confirmation of his Laws.

³ Ed. Aneurin Owen, folio, p. 50.

⁴ Myv. Arch., pp. 389, 397, 404.

⁵ Itin., v, fo. 40.

⁶ Cardiff Records, i, pp. 101, 156; ii, p. 14; v, p. 386; Annales Monastici, ed. Luard, i, p. 100.

⁷ There are copies of the panegyric in at least four seventeenth century MSS.—Cardiff MS. 23, p. 252; Llanstephan MS. 167, p. 339; Additional MS. 12, 230, p. 240; Hafod MS. 10, fo. 34 (fragmentary). There is a summary of it in Lewis Morris, Celtic Remains, pp. 315-6. Dafydd ab Gwilym in two of his poems (ed. 1789, pp. 418, 448) alludes to Mordeyrn.

seems to contain all that is known of him. His name is not entered in a single Bonedd or Achau y Saint. The bard informs us that he was a king's son, "the offspring of blessed Edeyrn," a grandson of Cunedda Wledig, and "of the same blood" as S. David. This makes him the son of Edeyrn (or rather, Ederne) ab Cunedda, who, in the Cuneddan Conquest of Wales, is credited with having received as his share the district of Edeyrnion, in North-east Merionethshire.

Mordeyrn served God from his youth up. When many of his kin of the twenty thousand Saints went to Bardsey, a causeway rose out of the sea for their passage, but Mordeyrn crossed thither to them on his golden-maned steed without wetting so much as a hoof; hence his name, "the Sovereign of the Sea." This "leader and confessor of the Faith" afterwards returned to his home in the vale of Nantglyn, where he has "a befitting house (church), with ornate Sacrifice." Here, where he died, is his shrine, as well as his beautiful image, which imparted health to all sick folk. His devotees he rid of every affliction, and such as resorted to him for their cattle had them preserved from disease for a whole year. They came laden with "oblations of fine wax and gold." Might he ever defend his people from all harm and ill, and finally bring them all safe to heaven!

His festival is not given in any of the Welsh Calendars, but in the MS. additions to the Calendar in a copy of the Preces Privatæ of 1573 in the S. Beuno's (Jesuit) College Library there is entered against July 25, "G. mab. Na'tglyn," the Feast of the Patron of Nantglyn. Edward Lhuyd says that "his Feast (is) y^e First Sund: after St. James's."

The only parish of which Mordeyrn is known to have been patron is Nantglyn, near Denbigh. The old Capel Mordeyrn has long since disappeared. The present parish church is dedicated to S. James the Apostle, whose festival day is the same as Mordeyrn's, which accounts for the ousting of the native Saint. The chapel was situated about a quarter of a mile from the church, on a part of Clasmor farm. Leland¹ writes of it, "There is a Chapelle by a Paroch Chirch in a Place caullid corruptely Nanclin for Nantglyn by Astrat-brooke, where as divers Sainctes were of auncient Tyme buried." Lhuyd, 1699, says that its foundations were to be seen in his time, and adds that the people there were "accustomed to sell turf (gweryd, terra) out of the chapel for the cure of diseases on cattle." He also mentions Ffynnon Fordeyrn, his Holy Well.²

¹ Ilin., iv, fo. 46.

² Parochialia, pp. 151-2, Suppl. to Arch. Camb., 1909. He observes of Nantglyn Sanctorum, "It was a sanctuary, they say."

The two ancient townships of the parish were named Nantglyn Canon and Nantglyn Sanctorum. What Leland says has, no doubt, reference to the latter; and the bridge over the brook is called Pont Rhyd y Saint. The former township took its name from Canon (or Cynon) ab Llywarch, whose progenies was located there.¹

S. MORFAEL

In a brief chronicle, printed in the Iolo MSS.,² entitled the "Periods of Oral Tradition and Chronology," but which is utterly unreliable, we are told that the mythical Llyr Llediaith "drove the Goidels out of his country . . . and made a caer on the banks of the river Loughor, which he called Dinmorfael, from the name of his dearest daughter, who died there. He subsequently erected there a church which was called Llanmorfael, but now its name is Loughor Castle." We should have expected it to appear as Llanforfael.

The Bonedd or Achau y Saint know nothing of a Morfael as Saint, but there was once a church that bore the name. One of the "Verses of the Graves" in the twelfth century *Black Book of Carmarthen*³ informs us that—

The grave of Owain ab Urien (Rheged) is in a secluded part of the world—
Under the sod of Llan Morfael.

Morfael was also a man's name. It occurs in the Old-Welsh pedigrees in Harleian MS. 3859 as Mormayl. It was the name of a son of Cyndrwyn, and of an early bishop of S. David's.

S. MORHAIARN, Confessor

OF Morhaiarn absolutely nothing appears to be known beyond the fact that he is patron of Trewalchmai, subject to Heneglwyys, in Anglesey,⁴ and that his festival was observed there on All Saints' Day.⁵

¹ Seebohm, Tribal System in Wales, 1904, append. B (Extent of Denbigh, 1335).

² P. 38.

³ Ed. Evans, 1906, p. 64; Skene, ii, p. 29. Stephens, Literature of the Kymry, 1876, p. 184, thought it was in Pembrokeshire, east of Fishguard.

⁴ J. Gwenogvryn Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 912. With the name compare the Breton Morhuarn.

⁵ Browne Willis, Bangor, 1721, p. 281; Nicolas Owen, History of Anglesey, 1775, p. 57.

S. MORWENNA, see S. MONYNNA

S. MWCHWDW

THERE were some years ago the remains of a chapel, dedicated to this Saint, on an eminence some three-quarters of a mile south of Parys Mountain—towards its western end—in the parish of Rhosybol, Anglesey. There is nothing to be seen of it to-day. But the tenant farmer in ploughing the field comes across its foundations; and a tombstone, which now does duty as a door-step to a house in the parish, is believed to have come from the cemetery which the chapel is known to have had.

The Saint's name occurs under various spellings, but oftenest as Bwchwdw and Mwchwdw, and the chapel is generally known as Bettws Bwchwdw. Leland¹ gives it as "Bettws Machwdo;" and in a parish-list of 1590-1² it occurs as "Ll. vochwdw." Nothing is known locally of the Saint.

S. MWROG, Confessor

THIS Saint's name does not occur in any copy of the Welsh saintly pedigrees. Two parish churches are, or were, under his invocation. One, the more important church, is Llanfwrog, Denbighshire, on the outskirts of the town of Ruthin, but which has for many centuries, no doubt at some re-building, been re-dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. Above the church is a field called, in the terrier of 1672, Bryn Mwrog, which forms part of the glebe.³ The other church is Llanfwrog, under Llanfaethlu, in Anglesey. There is a tradition that there was formerly a small chapel, dedicated to him, in a field called Mynwent Mwrog, on Cefnglas Farm, about a mile from this church, but not a vestige of it now remains. It has been supposed,⁴ but quite wrongly, that Bodwrog Church, under Llandrygarn, also in Anglesey, is dedicated to him, and not to Twrog.

Festival days in two different months are given him—in January,

¹ Collect., 1774, iv, p. 88.

² J. Gwenogvryn Evans, Report on Welsh MSS., i, p. 912. For Bettws (= Bead-house) becoming Llan, cf. Bettws Cadwaladr, now Llangadwaladr, in Denbighshire.

³ "Bryn y Golwg (the Hill of the View) was the name formerly of the spot where Llanfwrog Church now stands"—Peniarth MSS. 134, 176; Cardiff MS. 15.

⁴ Lewis Morris, Celtic Remains, pp. 41, 321.

but unknown to the calendars, and in September. Browne Willis¹ gives January 6 for Anglesey, and the 16th for Denbighshire; Rees,² the 6th and 15th. Possibly he has been mistaken for S. Maurus founder and abbot of Glanfeuil or S. Maur-sur-Loire, on January 15. September 23 is his festival in the Welsh MS. additions to the calendar in a copy of the Preces Privatæ, 1573, in S. Beuno's (Jesuit) College Library; the 24th in the Calendars in Peniarth MSS. 27 (pt. i), 172, 186, 187, 219, Jesus College MSS. 22, 141, Mostyn MS. 88, Llanstephan MSS. 117, 181, the Iolo MSS., and the Welsh Prymer of 1546; and the 25th in Additional MS. 14,882. These calendars, almost unanimously, give the 24th as his day; and the festival of the neighbouring S. Meugan at Llanrhydd, Ruthin, on the 25th, would favour that date.

There is a poem written in his honour, Cywydd i Fwrog Sant, to be found in Llanstephan MS. 167, of the end of the seventeenth century, by an unknown bard, but it contains no particulars of his life.³ He is "a crosiered shepherd in his choir, supreme, like a Beuno of Ruthin"; and we have related his posthumous miracles in the cure of the sick and the blind and the lame. William of Worcester⁴ says that he reposes at Ruthin. "Mwrog haeldeg" (the bounteous-fair) is mentioned among the dozen "seamen" who formed S. Cybi's "family," and who are nearly all associated as Saints with Anglesey.⁵ Lewis Glyn Cothi invokes his protection for the subject of one of his poems, and in another poem exclaims, "Myn delw Fwrog Wyn!" (By the Blessed Mwrog's image!).⁶ His name occurs twice in an ode to King Henry VII,⁷ wherein the poet invokes the protection and aid of a great number of Saints for that king.

A Ffynnon Fwrog is mentioned as being near Llansannan, and Cae Mwrog is the name of a parcel of land belonging to a Llanfyllin charity.

There was a S. Moroc, Bishop and Confessor, in Scotland, whose festival is November 8. His church and sepulchre (Maworrock) are stated in the Martyrology of Aberdeen to be at Lekraw, near Stirling. At Dowally, near Dunkeld, is a place called Kilmorick, and a Kilmorack in Inverness-shire.⁸

¹ Bangor, 1721, pp. 278, 280. Nicolas Owen, Hist. of Anglesey, 1775, p. 59, gives the 6th for the Anglesey parish.

² Welsh Saints, p. 308.

³ It is probably this poem that is referred to in Myv. Arch., p. 428.

⁴ Itin., p. 119.

⁵ Their names are given in a short poem, Teulu Cybi Sant, which occurs in Peniarth MS. 225, Mostyn MS. 110, and elsewhere.

⁶ Gwaith, 1837, pp. 53, 96.

⁷ Iolo MSS., pp. 313-5.

⁸ Forbes, Kalendars of Scottish Saints, 1872, p. 414.

S. MWYNEN or MWYNWEN, Virgin

MWYNEN and Mwynwen represent one person. In the *Myvyrian Archaiology*¹ she is made, as Mwynen, to be a daughter of Brychan, but in the Iolo MSS.,² as Mwynen and Mwynwen, his grand-daughter, being the daughter of Brynach Wyddel by Brychan's daughter Corth or Cymorth, and she is there further said to be the sister of Gerwyn, Gwenan, and Gwenlliw. The early Brychan lists know nothing of her or of her mother.

See S. MONYNNA.

S. MYBARD, see S. MEUBREDS. MYDAN, Confessor

THE sole authority for this Saint is an entry in the Iolo MSS.,³ where he is stated to have been the son of Pasgen ab Urien Rheged, and a Saint of Côr Catwg, at Llancarfan. He had a brother, S. Gwrfyw, who was the father of S. Nidan. It is quite possible that Mydan is a misreading for Nidan, with the father's name dropped out, as not infrequently the case in late documents. See, however, under S. MEDAN.

S. MYFOR, Confessor

THE early forms of the Monmouthshire Church-name, Llanover, clearly suggest, as the name of the Saint involved, a form which might appear in modern spelling as Myfor. The church is now dedicated to S. Bartholomew, but it has been generally supposed that its original patron was a hermit named Gofor or Gover. See what has been said of the church-name and the Saint under S. GOROR (p. 133). The Mawr of Merthyr Mawr⁴ (now dedicated to S. Teilo), in Glamorgan-shire, is a corruption of the Myfor name. It should be stated that Merthyr does not appear to have borne in Wales the same meaning as the Latin Martyrium, but probably meant, as in Ireland, a cemetery

¹ P. 428.

² Pp. 121, 141.

³ P. 102.

⁴ For the Book of Llan Dâw forms of the name see the references in its index, p. 412.

They should be given which had been sanctified by the relics (in Irish, martre) of a Saint, in this case Myfor, with perhaps a small chapel; so that it does not follow that the Saint was a martyr.

Myfor is a rare name. Sir John Rhys suggests ¹ that the doubtful reading, Mavorius, of an inscribed stone at Kirkmadrine, Wigtownshire, may perhaps be related to it.

S. MYGNACH

THE sole authority for Mygnach as a Saint is the Iolo MSS., where occur the two following entries: "Mygnach, the son of Mydno, of Caer Seon, was registrar of Côt Cybi. He was a Saint at Caer Gybi, in Anglesey, and afterwards principal of that Côt."² "S. Mygnach, of Caer Leon, the son of Mydno ab Gwron ab Arch ab Gwrddyled ab Eginir ab Owain Finddu ab Macsen Wledig."³ By Caer Seon is, no doubt, meant the Roman fortress Segontium, near Carnarvon.

The same work contains the following notice, with, it would appear, a reference to Mygnach: "The three Chief Bards of Maelgwn Gwynedd, who were also the three primitive Chief Bards of Gwynedd, were Mynach ab Nywmon (al. ab Mydnaw), the son of the King of Orc (Orkney), Unhwch Unarchen, and Maeldaf ab Unhwch; but Taliessin, Chief of the Bards, acquired superiority over these three, by releasing Elphin ab Gwyddno from the prison of Maelgwn Gwynedd, where he was confined under thirteen locks."⁴

Mygnach may have been a Saint for all we know, but he was certainly a bard. In the twelfth century *Black Book of Carmarthen*⁵ occurs a dialogue in verse, which is entitled in the Myvyrian text,⁶ "A Dialogue between Ugnach ab Mydno, of Caer Seon, and Taliessin, of Caer Deganwy." It is of a purely secular character, and represents Ugnach or Mygnach as lord of a dinas, or stronghold, near Carnarvon. Taliessin addresses him as "the most affluent in riches," and invokes "a blessing upon his throne."

A Mygnach Gor, or the Dwarf, is recorded in the *Triads*⁷ as having a daughter named Fflur, who was carried away by the Romans, an incident which, it is alleged, led to the invasion of Britain under Julius Cæsar.

¹ Y Cymmrodor, xviii (1905), p. 36.

² P. 109.

³ P. 139.

⁴ P. 73.

⁵ Ed. Evans, 1906, pp. 101-2; Skene, ii, pp. 56-7.

⁶ P. 44.

⁷ Myv. Arch., pp. 392-3, 399, 410.

S. MYLLIN, see S. MOLING

S. MYNNO, Confessor

This is the now-forgotten patron Saint of Moylgrove (in Welsh, Tre Wyddel), Pembrokeshire, which is to-day given, but doubtfully, S. Andrew as its patron.¹ In the Vairdre Book, under the parish, we find: ² "the said stang of grownd w^{ch} was geven to the churche for the said tith w^{ch} stange is called stanged mynno vzd such a saintes stang." In composition with Llan the name would be liable to be modified into Wynno.

¹ Lewis, Topog. Dict. (1833), and Diocesan Calendar; Browne Willis, to S. David; Rice Rees, no dedication.

² Owen's Pembrokeshire, ii, p. 307.

